SEED CORN PARAMOUNT NEED

Farmers Must Take Prompt And Vigorous Action For 1916 Says F. G. Churchill

Iowa farmers must take prompt and vigorous action to secure good seed corn for 1926, is the warning issued by F. G. Churchill, of the extension service, Iowa State College.

Germination tests completed by the Des Moines County Farm Bureau on 48 samples of corn show that 31 samples of early selected seed germinated 80 percent strong, 15 samples of late harvested corn germinated 55 percent strong, 4 samples of 1924 crib corn germinated 85 percent strong and 1 sample of 1922 corn tested 72 percent strong.

Union county tests show that the seed which was collected early and properly stored is testing out 97 percent strong while the late gathered seed ranges only from 47 to 67 percent strong.

The vitality of the Iowa corn exhibited at the International Hay and Grain Show at Chicago was far from satisfactory. Altho this supposedly was some of the best Iowa had to offer it tested out only 55 to 89percent strong.

Tests thus far have shown that practically every county in Iowa will have to use the individual ear germination test in order to secure the best seed corn for 1926 and in preparation for this Iowa State College is revising its bulletin on the rag doll germination test and it will be available in a short time.

Commercial ice companies taking ice from the water of lakes and rivers in Iowa in the future will have to pay 3 cents per ton to the state for exploitation of its natural resources, it has been decided by the board of conservation and the executive council. This ruling is expected to bring the state much revenue from hundreds of thousands of tons of ice annually.

OBITUARY—MRS. WILL LAU

The death of Mrs. Will Lau, of Garner, came as a shock to her many friends Sunday, December 27. She had not been in good health for some time, and had been taken to a Mason City hospital for a major operation on Saturday, December 19. Her condition didn ot improve as was hoped and she passed away at 12:30 Sunday. The funeral was held from the home last Wednesday afternoon at 1:00 o'clock and from the Methodist church at 1:30, conducted by Rev. Van Metre of Garner and Rev. A. W. Gauger of Klemme. The remains were brought to Klemme for burial in the family lot.

Sena Lena Blank, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Taalkeus Blank, was born April 5, 1885, in Bunda, Ostbulsland, Germany. When she was one year and four months old her parents came to the United States and for four years they lived at Belmond. They then moved to Hayfield and lived there from 1891 o 1895, when they moved to Klemme.

She was married to William Lau on June 1, 1904, at Klemme, where they lived for four years. In 1908 they moved to Wilmot, Minn., and aftr seven months there they moved to Garner, and have lived there for 16 years. She grew up in the German Methodist Church, and on the union of the churches in Garner she became a member of the First Methodist Church.

Four children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Lau—Lonard, who is a graduate of the Iowa School for Deaf, and is now attending college at Washington, D. C.; Milvern, Leroy and Taalkeus, who are at home and attend the local schools.

Besides a husband and four sons, Ms. Lau leaves her parents, four sisters and three brothers. One brothera nd one sister preceded her in death. Her brothers and sisters are Mrs. Anton Ahrenkiel of Goodell, Ralph Blank of Estherville, Mrs. Conrad Quandt of Klemme, Fred Blank of Morrison, Iowa, Casey Blank of Dysart, Iowa, Mrs. Usher of Palo, Iowa, Marie Blank of Klemme. Her sister Gretchen died five years ago, and a brother died in infancy.

She was a member of the Methodist church, the Rebekahs, the Royal Neighbors and the American Legion Auxiliary, and was active n all of these organizations. She was a loving wife, a kind and indulgent mother, and will be sadly missed 'n the home and by her many friends. She was a good woman, and her untimely passing is a sad blow to her husband, and sons, her aged parents and her brothers and sisters.

HOWARD AFRICA HEARD FROM

The other day a copy of the Eastern Colorado Leader, published at Limon, Colo., found its way to our desk. We looked it over and found that our old friend, Howard Africa, is the publisher. He was formerly the publisher of the Reporter at Kanawha. Examining the copy further we found the follwing "marked copy," of interest to our readers in Klemme:

"Miss Haskell, who resides with her parents ten miles northeast f Limon, was in our city Tuesday and a plasant caller at this office. Miss Haskell came here from Klemme, Iowa, at which place the writer was employed in his younger days and we found there were a number of people liv'ng at Klemme whom we both knw. It is certainly fine to meet someone who knows the same people you do, especially when you are so far away from your former home."

Howard is getting out a fine paper and from all appearances Limon is a live-wire town.

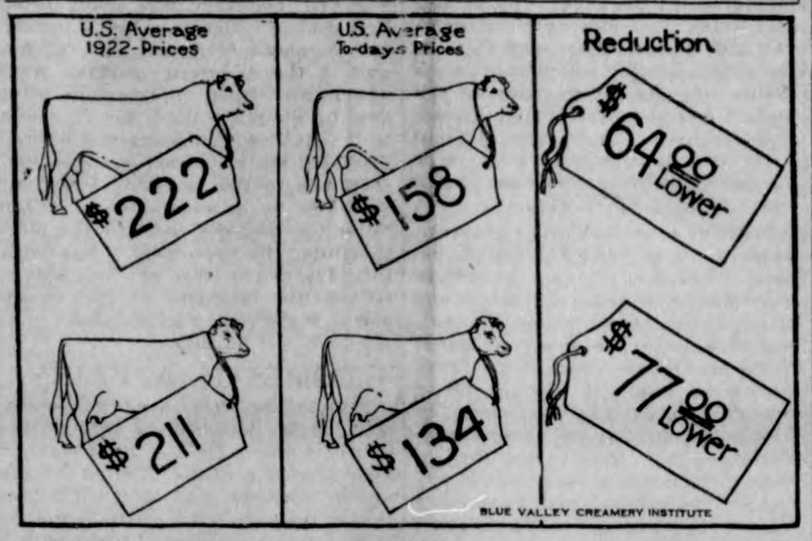
Bargain Pure-Bred Prices Boon for Dairy Farmer



PURE-BRED dairy cattle are now selling at bargain prices, according to the Blue Valley Creamery Institute, which has just completed a survey of the dairy industry. This is certainly the time to improve herds. At no time in the past ten years has there been such a favorable opportunity for the man or woman who milks cows to acquire good blood. In 1922 pure-bred dairy bulls of all breeds averaged $222.00. Today this same pure-bred bull is being purchased for an average of $158.00. Still more marked is the decline in average prices of pure-bred cows, which in 1922 brought $211.00, but today is changing hands for $134.00.

The marked advantage of using pure-bred bulls, declares the Institute, is easily shown in a study of a recent survey of 577 farms. Those farmers who used a scrub bull from one to five years had a labor income of $198.00—less than a hired man's wages. Continuing the use of scrub bulls from five to ten years, they found themselves $243.00 in the hole. But the farmers who used pure-bred bulls from one to five years had a labor income of $709.00 and when these same pure-bred bulls were used continuously up to ten years, the labor income jumped to $1,102.00 per year.

The dairy farmer who uses good milk cows will find, as always, that they will help to make his financial position secure, carry part of the burden of his mortgages and taxes, buy education for his children, pay for the new house and barn and leave the farm itself more productive as the years roll by. Now is the opportunity of a decade to build up a pure-bred dairy herd, according to the Institute.

UNIVERSAL DRAFT

Congressman Ramseyer, of Iowa, has proposed a joint resolution, providing for the appointment of a joint committee to consist of five senators and five representatives, whose duty shall be to formulate a law for the drafting of all resources of the United States, human and material, for national defense in the event of war, and report its conclusions to Congress in December, 1926.

Mr. Ramseyer believes that in the event of future war, every man and every woman should be called under the flag for assignment for whatever service, military or civil, the individual is best fitted. And that every plant, agency and facility may be called to universal service, and not one penny of war profit shall inure to the benefit of private individual, firm or corporation.

Among the objections to this plan is that of the pension list to follow. That has been answered by the suggestion to adopt a universal old-age pension law. Another, and the most serious objection is that if the profit is taken out of war there never will be any more wars. The late Senator LaFollette was crucified because he insisted that those who made great profits from the war should be assessed to pay the expense of it, and to some extent that has been done, but most of it has been passed on to the final consumer. In any event this plan and proposition will find a hearty response from every man and woman in the nation, with the possible exception of manufacturers of arms and ammunition.—Eagle Grove Eagle.

METHODIST CHURCH NOTES
A. W. Gauger

Our first service of the New Year gave us a splendid opening despite the bad weather.

In forming your New Year's Resolutions how about the resolution of being a one hundred percent Church attendant this year? It should be included. It is workable. It will be your greatest asset in 1926.

Our prayer meetings hereafter will be held in the homes until warmer weather sets in.

The Liberty W. F. M. S. is held on Wednesday of this week. Splendid interest was manifested in the last meeting.

We are looking forward to great meetings to be held in the not distant future. One is a great Convention to be held in Des Moines Jan. 28-29. Speakers and men of national reputation will be on the program. An attendance of from 1,000 to 1,500 is looked for. This will be a delegated convention.

Another great meeting follows on Feb. 17. This will be held in Algona, and is open to everybody. Have this in your program for February and plan to go. More definite information will be given later.

Our leading thought for next Sunday morning is, "The National (we may say international) Crime Wave —Its Cause."

This is to be followed by a sermon in which the cure will be pointed out. All parents, and every citizen of this community should hear these two sermons.

THE AMERICAN FLAG

When the question of selecting a suitable flag for the Sesquicentenial International Exposition, which opens at Philadelphia June 1, 1916; arose it became at once evident that because of the nature of the event which the Exposition was to celebrate only one standard could properly be used. This was the flag of the United States of America.

With a few exceptions, our flag is the oldest in the world. It has stood substantially the same for nearly 150 years, while in other lands national emblems have changed as empires have fallen and vast political upheavals brought with them new banners to claim the allegiance of the populace.

Contray to general belief the flag of the United States was not an inspired creation. It was formed from the continental Union flag by substituting in the canton a circlet of thirteen stars for the two crosses—St. George's and St. Andrew's—of Britain. The stripes were already there.

George Washington described it's making thus: "We take the star from Heaven; the red from our mother country, separating it by the white stripes, thus showing that we have separated from her; and the white stripes shall go down to posterity representing liberty."

In the coat of arms of Washington there were, curiously, both stars and stripes represented, and many historians have sought to establish a connection between this and the conception of the flag. Except for the coincidence, not a scrap of evidence has ever been discovered to support this theory, however, attractive as it is.

It was a year after the signing of the Declaration of Independence that the first legislation for the flag was enacted. On June 14, 1777, now celebrated by us as Flag Day, Congress, sitting in Philadelphia, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the flag of the thirteen United States be thirteen stripes, alternate red and white; and the union be thirteen stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation."

This was the first official step toward the adoption of our national emblem. The resolution was officially published in August and the design first promulgated by Congress on September 3rd. Where it was first displayed is still a question of dispute, but it flew in the breeze at the battle of Brandywine on September 11th, at Germantown on October 4th, and in all subsequent encounters. The connection of Betsy Ross with it is a beloved legend enshrined in the hearts of the school children.

In the spring of 1795, two more states having been added to the Union, the circle of thirteen stars was changed to a square of fifteen to include the new states. In this form it remained for twenty-three years, and so it was when it inspired Francis Scott Key to write the immortal anthem of the Star Spangled Banner which has become inseparable from it in the thought of Americans.

The last modification of the flag was in 1818 when, the number of states having grown to twenty, and additional ones foreseen in the future, President Monroe signed an act to the effect that every new state admitted into the Union would be recognized on the 4th of July following its admission by the addition of a new star to the flag.

The bill was signed on April 14, 1818, and in the 108 years that have passed twenty-eight more stars have appeared in the blue field, but otherwise our flag has not changed.

FARM BUREAU ENTERTAINED BANKERS AND EDITORS AT BANQUET

Meeting Of Farm Bureau Officers And Directors Held At Garner Monday Afternoon

The bankers and editors of the county were entertained at a banquet at the K. C. Hall at Garner on Monday evening, as guests of the Hancock County Farm Bureau.

Bankers F. A. Arnold and C. G. Waterman and Editor R. A. Jorgenson, of Klemme attended from this part of the county.

This meeting was the annual meeting of the Farm Bureau officers and directors and was held in the afternoon. The evening was featured by a big banquet followed by speeches and talks and a "round table discussion" by all. Mr. MacDonald, an extension worker from Ames was the principal speaker, his topic being "Organization, Co-operation and Education," which are the lines along which the Farm Bureau has grown from a few in numbers to hundreds of thousands in strength.

Such meetings, we believe, should be held more often as it puts the farmer, business man and professional man in closer contact with each other, as all are striving for the same goal in this great agricultural state.

County Agent L. T. Nutty reviewed the work completed the past year and outlined the work scheduled for the year 1926. The report showed that a great deal of helpful work had been accomplished in the various departments of the Bureau.

MR. AND MRS. JOHN JOSTEN CELEBRATED 25th WEDDING ANNIVERSARY NEW YEAR DAY

New Year's Day was the twenty-fifth wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. John Josten and in honor of the event Mr. Josten's brothers and sister planned a surprise party for them. Accordingly, all brought well filled baskets of good things to eat and lunch was served at 1 o'clock in the afternoon. The program was thought up on the spur of the moment and consisted mainly of short talks by various persons present and a delightful time was had. Rev. A. W. Gauger gave a very fine talk, which was followed by a talk by Mr. Valentine Josten. Others present entered into the spirit of the occasion with short talks.

Mr. and Mrs. John Josten were presented with twenty-five silver dollars, a gift from the brothers and sister.

Those present were Valentine Josten, Henry Josten, Mr. and Mrs. Peter Josten and son, Erick Josten, Mr and Mrs. Aug. Haberkamp, and Rev and Mrs. A. W. Gauger.

On account or recent deaths on both sides of the family, an elaborate affair had not been planned.

HURRAH! FOR OUR SIDE!

A press dispatch from Chicago the other day told about the statement of an Iowo college president in that city. "George Washington was of Scandinavian origin," Dr. Oscar Olson, president of Luther college, Decorah, declared in an address at the University of Chicago on the relation of the Norse and English languages." More than 500 English words are of Norwegian, Danish or Swedish descent," he said. "The names of five presidents ending in 'son' indicate they had Scandinavian blood in their veins," he maintained. They are Jefferson, Jackson, Harrison, Johnson and Wilson.

EVENTS OF 1925 SEEN IN REVIEW

Noteworthy Happenings of the Past Year in the United States and Elsewhere.

LOCARNO PACT SIGNED

Powers of Western Europe Make Treaties That Promise Security and Peace—Revolt of Islam Is Growing—Prosperity and Tax Reduction for Americans—Storm Over Air Service.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

Standing far above all other events of the year 1925 is the signing of the Locarno treaties. Though they do not mean the immediate coming of the millennium, they do mean that the European powers have decided that war does not pay, and they give to western Europe at least a measurable assurance of security and peace. This holds good so long as the signatory powers keep the promises made in the pacts, and should any of them fail to do so, the League of Nations is ready to step in. Germany has resumed her place in the family of nations, and as the year drew to a close there was great hope that soviet Russia would abandon her voluntary isolation and consent to closer association with the "capitalistic powers" that she has so long contemned. Locarno was a magnificent triumph for Austen Chamberlain, Aristide Briand, Dr. Hans Luther and Herr Stresemann, the statesmen mainly responsible for the treaties, and for the legislators and people in their respective countries who gave them hearty support.

Another important development of the year was the growing revolt of Islam against the rule of Christian powers. This manifested itself especially in the war in the Riff maintained against France and Spain throughout the year by Abd-el-Krim, and in the rebellion against the French regime in Syria. The latter was primarily carried on by the Druses, nonmoslem tribesmen, but the Mohammedan Arabs took at times an active part in it. Turkey took warlike measures because she was convinced the League of Nations would decide the Mosul dispute in favor of Great Britain; and in Egypt there was unrest that occasionally broke out into violence.

Twelve more months of almost incessant civil warfare, complicated by Bolshevik plotting and threatened uprisings against foreigners, was the record of China. Nevertheless the central government was maintained and the international conference at Peking held out some promise of settling the affairs of the distracted country.

The United States was blessed with general prosperity and progress during the year, and this was reflected in the bill introduced in the Sixty-ninth congress providing for reduction of taxes which would reduce the national revenue by $325,736,000. Enforcement of the prohibition law continued to be a serious problem, but toward the end of the year the government adopted a new policy that promised to go far toward keeping illicit liquor out of the country. During many months a storm raged around the air services of the army and navy, due largely to the sensational charges made by Col. William Mitchell, for which he was tried by court-martial, and suspended for five years. His plan of an independent department of aviation was turned down by a board of inquiry appointed by the President. The controversy was accentuated by the tragic destruction of the dirigible Shenandoah in a storm and by the failure of an attempted nonstop airplane flight to Hawaii.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

Prompted by Great Britain, the German government suggested the international conference that finally resulted in the Locarno treaties, but there were months of "conversations," exchanges of notes and secret talks before the great fact was accomplished. Briand was forced to move cautiously because of political complications, and Luther and Stresemann always had the irreconcilable German Nationalists to contend with. It was on October 5 that the foreign ministers of France, Germany, Great Britain, Belgium, Italy, Poland and Czechoslovakia came together in the little Swiss town of Locarno. Eleven days later they had completed their task, and on December 1 the momentous treaties were formally signed in London. The main treaty, known as the security pact, binds France and Germany and Belgium to respect the boundaries between those countries as fixed by the Treaty of Versailles; each promises not to attack either of the others; and Great Britain and Italy guarantee the inviolability of the frontiers. Provision is made for referring disputes to a conciliation commission, the permanent court of international justice or the council of the league. Arbitration treaties were signed between Germany and Poland and Germany and Czechoslovakia, and in subsidiary pacts France guaranteed the carrying out of these. The allies made immediate plans for speeding up the evacuation of the Cologne area and the reduction of their forces in the Rhineland.

As soon as the security pact became a certainty, President Coolidge let it be known that he would like to call an international conference on land disarmament in Washington. The reaction to this in Europe, especially in France, was not favorable because the League of Nations was planning the same thing. Early in December the league's disarmament council announced that a special commission would be created to prepare for such a conference, and the United States and Soviet Russia were invited to appoint representatives on that commission.

The League of Nations, which held its annual meeting in Geneva in September with Senator Raoul Dandurand of Canada as president, received Great Britain's protest against violation of the Mosul frontier by Turkey and referred the dispute over that rich oil region to the World court. The court ruled that the league's council was competent to decide the matter, and in December the council awarded all of the vilayet except a worthless strip to Irak, at the same time extending the British mandate over Irak to twenty-five years. Turkey protested angrily, but was somewhat mollified by Britain's offer to negotiate a permanent peace on the Irak frontier, with hints of compensation for the oil lands. The council of the league was called on to prevent one war, and did so. Greece and Bulgaria were ready to fight over some trouble on the Macedonian frontier, and the Greeks went so far as to invade Bulgarian territory and occupy several towns. The league council ordered that hostilities cease at once, saw to it that the order was obeyed, and sent a mission to settle the dispute. Greece was found at fault and was ordered to pay damages to Bulgaria.

Abd-el-Krim's attempt to drive the French from the Riff and establish an independent government in that part of Morocco was not successful, but caused the two European powers much trouble and expense. They joined forces against the Riff leader, and after the Spanish effected a landing in Alhucemas bay in September Krim was virtually surrounded and was driven into the mountains. A group of American aviators formed an escadrille and helped in the fight against the Moroccan chieftain.

Strikes in the Shanghai cotton mills, fostered by Russian Bolshevist agents who sought to stir up civil war in China, resulted in fatal rioting in May and the anti-foreign threats made necessary the landing of American and European bluejackets and the arming of a force of foreign volunteers. This only enraged the Chinese the more and the government at Peking was utterly unable to straighten out the tangle. On August 5 the Washington treaties relating to Chinese customs and the open door went into effect, and in October the international conference to carry them out began its sessions in Peking. China demanded autonomy in the matter of the tariff, and the conferees agreed to give it this not later than January 1, 1929, provided that in the meantime China should abolish the likin.

Great progress was made in the settlement of international debts. In August Great Britain granted exceedingly liberal terms to France, but with the provision that if France obtained less favorable terms from the United States the British would insist on the same terms that the United States exacted. The French mission spent some time in Washington but was unable to satisfy the demands of the American debt commission and went home with a temporary plan which was rejected by the French parliament. In December, when Briand became premier again M. Beranger was appointed ambassador to Washington for the purpose of reopening negotiations. The American debts of Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Italy and Rumania were arranged satisfactorily to those countries.

President Coolidge, to whom the long standing dispute between Peru and Chile over Tacna and Arica provinces had been referred, sent General Pershing down there to arrange and conduct a plebiscite of the inhabitants of the region. The Chileans protested when he deferred the date of the plebiscite until April 15, 1926, and appealed to President Coolidge.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Politics in Great Britain were not especially eventful. The Liberal party recovered somewhat from its crushing defeat in the elections of 1924, and Herbert Asquith, who was raised to the peerage as the earl of Oxford, was continued as its leader. Lloyd George pledged to him his unqualified loyalty. The Labor party did all in its power to combat the Baldwin government but was itself badly split between radicals and conservatives. All these parties and elements except the radical Laborites were kept busy fighting the schemes of the Communists. The government refused to admit foreign Communists to the country to attend the conference of the British Communist party in Glasgow, and later canceled the permits of many Communists to live in Great Britain.

What was called one of the most important events in the post-war history of the British empire occurred on April 28, when Great Britain returned to the gold standard. Australia and New Zealand took this step at the same time and the Union of South Africa followed suit on July 1. Canada was already back on a gold basis, so that at the mid-year the currency of the entire empire was virtually on a pre-war footing.

France's troubles, aside from the warfare in Morocco and Syria, were mainly financial. Premier Herriot held on until April 10, when the government's finance bill was defeated in parliament. Paul Painleve thereupon became premier and he gave the finance portfolio to Joseph Caillaux, who was convicted during the war of treason. Aristide Briand took the post of foreign minister. Caillaux was no more successful than his predecessors and the cabinet resigned October 27. Painleve formed a new ministry, but this went on the rocks in November. Briand was made premier again and Louis Loucheur, one of the wealthiest of Frenchmen, became minister of finance. His plans were rejected and he gave place to Paul Doumer.

The revolt of the Druses in Syria, held by France under a mandate, became serious in July and the tribesmen defeated the French forces several times. They filtered into Damascus and started an uprising there in the suppression of which the French shelled the Moslem quarters of the ancient city and battered it to pieces. Reinforcements were poured into Syria but the tribesmen kept up a harassing guerrilla warfare which was extended into Lebanon.

Germany's new reichstag convened January 5 and Dr. Hans Luther became chancellor, pledging himself to maintain the republic and the Dawes plan. The Monarchists and Nationalists were strong in his cabinet. March 29 the first popular elections for President were held and resulted in no candidate receiving a majority. The Nationalists and several other groups then made Field Marshal von Hindenburg their nominee, and at the second elections, held April 26, he was elected. It was freely predicted that this meant the early restoration of the German empire, but the old soldier took the pledge of loyalty to the republic and thereafter gave not the slightest indication that he desired a return to monarchism.

In December the cabinet resigned so that a new ministry fully in favor of the Locarno treaties might be formed.

Benito Mussolini continued to rule Italy with a firm hand, and the position of the Fascisti was strengthened in the autumn by a split in the opposition, the Maximalist Socialists severing their conection with the other groups forming the Aventine bloc. The dictator began the year by taking steps to suppress the opposition organizations and newspapers, and before the twelfth month was ended the parliament had at his behest passed a number of laws, electoral and otherwise, that made Fascismo supreme and Mussolini's dictatorship complete. In November the police uncovered a plot to assassinate the premier and overthrow the government, and one result of this was a renewal of measures to suppress the Freemasons.

Primo de Rivera, dictator of Spain, caused some surprise in December by announcing that the time to end the military dictatorship had come. He formed a civilian cabinet, retaining the position of premier. On the whole the rule of the directory seemed to have been beneficial to the country. In Portugal cabinet crises, small military revolts and Communist uprisings were rather frequent. Belgium experienced several changes of ministries, and so did Poland, where Skrynski came into power in November.

General Pangalos led a successful military and naval coup d'etat in Greece in June and the government was upset without bloodshed. Pangalos thereupon became premier. In September he dissolved the national assembly and ordered new elections.

Soviet Russia did not gain the confidence of the other powers to any great extent, for the diplomatic efforts of her rulers in that line were offset by the continuance of bolshevist propaganda abroad. Having failed to entice the proletariat of western Europe, they turned their attention especially to Japan and China. At home their chief concern was the state of mind of the Russian peasantry, which was so dissatisfied that revolt was in the air. As usual, there were crop failures in various districts and famine conditions were predicted, despite which the government exported wheat for political purposes.

To foster industries and attract foreign capital the Soviet government took steps during the year which led it farther and farther away from its Communist ideals. Industrial plants were returned to their former owners under lease and private capitalists were permitted to enter trade. Graft in government circles was sternly suppressed, on one occasion 12 officials being sentenced to death for this crime.

Egypt got into trouble with Great Britain when a group of radicals murdered Sir Lee Stack, the sirdar. The British exacted the death penalty for the assassins and compelled the Egyptian government to yield certain concessions that tightened the British grip on the disputed Sudan territory.

Ahmad Mirza, the young shah of Persia, enjoyed life so much in Paris that he refused to return to his country, so on October 31 the parliament deposed him and put an end to his dynasty. Riza Khan, the premier who once was a common soldier, assumed the throne as King Pahlavi. A. C. Millspaugh, American, is still administrator general of the finances of Persia, having made an excellent record for the year.

Conditions in Arabia were unsettled during the year, owing to the intermittent warfare between Ali, king of the Hedjaz, and Ibn Saud, king of Nejd and leader of the Wahabis. Ibn captured Mecca, but was defeated by Ali at Jeddah.

Captain Amundsen made a spectacular attempt to fly over the North pole, hopping off from Spitzbergen with two planes on May 21. The expedition succeeded in getting within 150 miles of the pole but was forced to descend and lost one of the planes. After great hardships the intrepid explorers returned to Spitzbergen on June 18.

Latin America had a comparatively uneventful year, which means there were fewer revolutions than usual. On January 23 the navy junta government of Chile was overthrown by army officers and a few days later the army and navy reached a peaceful agreement and recalled President Alessandri from his voluntary exile in Europe. In October Alessandri resigned and was succeeded by Emiliano Figueroa. Solarzano was inaugurated President of Nicaragua in January, and Barahona of Honduras. On August 3 the American marines were withdrawn from Nicaragua after keeping the peace there for 12 years. In Bolivia Jose Villaneuva was elected President but would not promise subserviance to the party of President Saavedra, so at the instance of the latter the congress declared the election void. On September 3 Saavedra turned over the office of chief executive to the president of the senate and new elections were ordered.

DOMESTIC AFFAIRS

Presidential electors of the states met January 12 and went through the formality of voting for President and vice president of the United States. Calvin Coolidge and Charles Gates Dawes were declared elected, and on March 4 they were duly inaugurated. Before that event congress had put through the usual grist of appropriation bills and had passed a measure increasing postal rates and the pay of postal employees. It also raised the salaries of its own members to $10,000 and of the cabinet members to $15,000.

Associate Justice McKenna of the Supreme court resigned January 4 and the President appointed Attorney General Harlan F. Stone to the vacancy. A few days later he nominated Charles B. Warren of Michigan to be attorney general. When the senate met in special session after the inauguration one of its first acts was to reject the Warren nomination because of his former business connections. The President sent in the name again, and again it was rejected. Mr. Coolidge thereupon nominated John G. Sargent for the place and he was accepted. Secretary of State Hughes retired from the cabinet on March 4, and was succeeded by Frank B. Kellogg, then ambassador to Great Britain. Secretary of War Weeks, who had been ill for many months, resigned on October 13, and Dwight F. Davis, assistant secretary, was given the portfolio. Mr. Davis' position was filled by the appointment of Col. Hanford MacNider, former national commander of the American Legion. William M. Jardine of Kansas was made secretary of agriculture on February 14. A change in the White House itself that was of especial interest to politicians was the resignation of C. Bascom Slemp as secretary to the President and the appointment of Everett Sanders of Indiana.

President Coolidge spent the summer vacation at Swampscott, Mass., and during the year he made several trips for the purpose of delivering addresses. The more important of these were to St. Paul, Minn., for the Norse-American centennial celebration; to Omaha for the meeting of the American Legion, and to Chicago for the convention of the American Farm Bureau federation. Vice President Dawes was exceedingly active in carrying on his campaign for revision of the rules of the senate, making speeches on that topic in many parts of the country. When the Sixty-ninth congress opened its sessions on December 7 he was ready to go on with his fight, but without glittering prospects of success.

The Republicans were in full control of the new congress, but the old insurgent bloc in the party was there again undaunted by disciplinary measures by which its members were deprived of most of their important committee assignments. In the lower house they refused to support the Republican candidate for speaker, Nicholas Longworth of Ohio, who nevertheless was elected. The Republicans also amended the rule concerning discharge of committees so that a majority of the house must sign a petition to take legislation out of a committee's hands and place it before the house. In the lower house sat three women members—Mrs. Rogers of Massachusetts and Mrs. Kahn of California on the Republican side and Mrs. Norton of New Jersey on the Democratic side. With a vast number of bills introduced at the beginning of the session, the house put at the top of the list the tax reduction measure that had been prepared by the ways and means committee during the fall, and at once went to work on it. This bill proposed a cut in income and other taxes that would reduce the national revenues by more than $325,000,000. It was virtually a nonpartisan measure and seemed assured of passage.

Aside from Vice President Dawes' effort to reform the senate procedure, interest in the upper house at first centered on the attitude of Senator Robert M. LaFollette, Jr., of Wisconsin, who had been elected to succeed his late father, the leader of the insurgents. The young man gave every indication that he would follow closely in the footsteps of his sire. Another of the radical senators had passed away—Senator Ladd of North Dakota—and Governor Sorlie had appointed Gerald P. Nye, an avowed follower of LaFollette, to succeed him. Some of the senators opposed the seating of Mr. Nye on the ground that the governor had no right, under the state constitution, to fill a senatorial vacancy. Senator Ralston of Indiana, a Democratic wheelhorse, died October 14 and A. R. Robinson, Republican, was appointed to fill the vacancy. Senator Spencer of Missouri also passed away and his place was filled by George H. Williams.

One of the most spectacular political battles of recent times was that waged for the mayoralty of New York. It began with a hot contest for the Democratic nomination between Gov. Al Smith and Tammany, whose choice was State Senator "Jimmy" Walker and the Hearst following, which urged the renomination of Mayor Hylan. Tammany won out, and in the election Walker was easily the victor over F. D. Waterman, the Republican nominee.

Col. William Mitchell, by his determined fight to improve the air service of the army and navy, made his name a household word. Early in the year his outspoken criticisms of his superiors resulted in his removal from the office of assistant chief of the army air service, but he kept on talking and writing until the War department had to order his trial by court-martial. Meanwhile the President had appointed a special board to inquire into the condition of the air service, and this board, after lengthy hearings, made a report upholding Mitchell in many of his criticisms. It condemned, however, his pet scheme for making the air service an independent department.

Having no warfare, no really serious business or economic troubles, and not much in the way of politics, the people of the United States devoted a great deal of attention to prohibition, its enforcement and its violation. It could not be denied that the dry law was not being thoroughly enforced, so in June General Andrews, assistant secretary of the treasury, was put in full charge of the job. He made a sweeping reorganization of the federal enforcement machinery, depriving Prohibition Commissioner Haynes of most of his powers and dividing the country into 24 districts with administrators responsible to him.

There is little need to remind readers of the Scopes trial in Dayton, Tenn., in which the school teacher was convicted of violating the state law forbidding the teaching of any theory of the origin of mankind contrary to that found in the Bible. With William Jennings Bryan leading the prosecution and Clarence Darrow, Chicago atheist, as chief counsel for the defense, the contest was between fundamentalism and liberalism, and the people of the country learned more about Charles Darwin and the theory of evolution than they would otherwise in a lifetime. However, there could be no "decision" in this contest. Mr. Scopes was found guilty on his own admission that he had violated the law. Only a few days after the close of the trial, on July 26, Mr. Bryan was found dead in bed.

INDUSTRIAL AND LABOR

Only one great strike marred the year's record in the United States. The anthracite miners had been demanding an increase in wages and the adoption of the check-off system by the operators, and after long and futile negotiations the men were called out of the mines on September 1. Because the stock of coal was large and owing to the use of oil and other substitutes, the consumer did not suffer greatly, but the effects of the strike on the miners and operators and the business men of the mining towns were serious. President Coolidge refused to interfere but asked congress to give the Chief Executive and the secretaries of commerce and labor the authority to intervene in such crises.

The American Federation of Labor held its annual meeting in Atlantic City in October, turned down all propositions for co-operation with the Russian trade unions and recognition of the Soviet government, and re-elected President Green and all other officers.

The Supreme Court of the United States on April 13 held unconstitutional that part of the Kansas industrial court act providing for compulsory arbitration of labor disputes. In October it ruled against the Arizona minimum wage law for women. A special federal court of equity exonerated the International Harvester company of trust charges, and Secretary of Agriculture Jardine dismissed the federal charges against the merger of the Armour and Morris packing concerns. Violent fluctuations of prices on the Chicago Board of Trade aroused the ire of farmers and of Secretary Jardine, and at his insistence the board in October adopted stringent rules to prevent price manipulation.

DISASTERS

Nature was not kind to the human race during the year, for earthquakes, tornadoes and floods took heavy toll of lives and property. In the United States the spectacular disaster was the destruction of the great navy dirigible Shenandoah in a storm over Ohio on September 3 as the airship was on her way to some state fairs in the Middle West. Commander Zachary Lansdowne and 13 men of his crew were killed. Another misfortune befell the navy on September 24 when the submarine S-51 was rammed by a steamship off the Rhode Island coast and went down with 33 men. Among other disasters were these: In February: Mine explosion in Dortmund, Germany, killed 138; Kansas City live stock pavilion and motor show burned, the loss being $2,500,000; mine explosion at Sullivan, Ind., killed 51. Prudence's Daughter

Jerrold looked at Prudence for assistance. Prudence was patiently counting the superfluous hearts.

After all, what was there to say? Why couldn't she? Obviously, she had. And that was the end of it.

The next morning Jerrold called Duane into the office.

"Do you want a position?" he asked, still hopeful for the best.

"Oh, absolutely. I came on purpose."

Jerrold sighed. But he told him to hang about, and put in the time as best he could, to try not to get in people's way, and if he accidentally came across anything he could do, to feel perfectly free to do it. He gave him cards to the best clubs, offered him the use of a car at any time he wished it and told him to get as much fun out of life as he could.

"How much salary do you want?"

"How much can I get?"

"Well, I fancy I could get men quite capable of doing what you're going to do for fifteen dollars a week, and glad of the chance," Jerrold said, smiling faintly. "But it lends a sort of tone to the establishment to have your clothes and your accent in our employ, so say twenty-five. And you might lounge gracefully about in the showroom as much as you can; you are sure to attract attention to the house if not to the motor."

Duane thanked him, and said he would try to be worthy of so much trust. He said he had other clothes, far more comment-creating than those he was wearing, and that his entire wardrobe was henceforth at the disposal of the Harmer Motor.

And then he laid serious and studied siege to the stubborn heart of Jerry. Every morning on the stroke of ten, a messenger appeared at the door with a box of flowers, violet, orchid and rose. Jerry gave them to the maids, sent them to the neighbors, but finally, in a burst of resentment at the persistence she was beginning to feel was more than flesh and blood could bear, she whirled the unopened box into the street the moment the messenger had disappeared.

The next morning when the bell rang, she ran furiously down to receive the hated tribute, but stopped on the stairs in some amazement, even in anger. Her mother was opening the box.

"Mother!"

"They are for me." Prudence tipped the box to show her name on the tag, to banish that springing distrust in Jerry's mutinous eyes.

"Since when is father so devoted?"

The clock struck ten—a curious coincidence. And then, as Prudence took the flowers from the box, a soft cluster of yellow roses and lilies of the valley, Jerry saw the card—Duane Allerton. Her eyes flashed, darkened with rage. She thrust out angry hands, and caught the delicate flowers roughly, to tear them from her mother's arm. Prudence gently but with great firmness retained her hold.

"Jerry! They're mine."

The soft voice was softer than ever before. Jerry's hands clung mutinously for a moment and then dropped weakly to her sides.

"Mother, please," she whispered. "I--I can't stand them in the house." And then, with a pitiful attempt to laugh away her display of emotion, she said with a sorry smile, "I—I must be developing nerves."

Prudence looked into her eyes, relented quickly. "I'll send them down to Carol. Katie can take them to the mail at once. Julia adores flowers."

The next morning, at ten o'clock, Jerry stood at the window listening for the expected, unwelcome ring at her door. It did not come. Ten-thirty, eleven—and no flowers. There was sad suspicion in her eyes as she glanced now and then, furtively, at her mother. Would her very own work in league against her?

Jerry had no slightest doubt of the honor and the uprightness of her stubborn stand. It was really a final desperate struggle in defense of her most sacred, girlish principle of purity, that inherent niceness of thought, reserve of person, that tarnishes at best, so quickly. Jerry had flirted, had frivoled joyously from beau to beau, had laughed at tentative, truanting caresses in sheer light-heartedness of spirit—that was when the real Jerry had slipped by untouched. But with that tender ideal enshrined in the romantic glamour of her guarded youth, she would brook no trifling.

She worked with passionate intensity, bending over the sketches for her houses and her columns of figures far, far into the night. She did not sleep well, she had no appetite, and unusual dark circles outlined the lovely misty eyes.

On her first attempt at renovation, the old house on Seventeenth street opposite the park, after weeks of work and worry and passionate devotion, she cleared but a paltry three hundred dollars, for all the fabulous towering of her hopes. Jerry laughed at that, gamely.

"I don't care! See how much fun I've had. And look what a lot of things I learned! I'll make it up on the next one, you'll see!"

But not all her increase concentration in her work could account for the pathetic pallor of her face. In the end, Jerrold felt that nothing would come of it. He said so to Prudence, many times. Prudence said nothing.

She asked if Duane was taking an interest in the business, if he worked hard, earned his salary.

"You bet he earns it, staying in the same town with that daughter of yours," Jerrold said resentfully; and added more moderately: "Well, no, I can't say that he works much—if any. But he sticks around. And people come in to look him over—and incidentally get a view of the car while they're in. And the boys seem to like him."

Jerrold had indeed no ground for feeling that Duane, even as a prospective, somewhat poorly prospective, son-in-law, had any designs upon the ultimate management of the Harmer Motor. In spite of his conscientious attendance in the showroom, his effacement from the active business of the concern was complete. But he developed an inordinate interest in the rich, prosy little Middle Western city and asked endless questions about it, questions of intimate import, when he and Jerrold were having luncheon together as they often did.

"I'm trying to acclimate myself to the corn belt," he said lightly, in explanation of this interest in things about town. But Jerrold, who was making him the subject of an avid attention and study, knew it was something deeper than that.

"Why, do you know," Duane asked him one day, "you can pick up land along the river, and near the railroads, for a song, absolutely for a song? Building sites that ought to be worth—well, I suppose not quite their weight in gold—but worth a fortune anyhow in ten to twenty years."

Jerrold said he supposed so, his shrewd, always kind eyes, fixed on Duane's face.

"They haven't half the factories, the manufacturing plants, they ought to have here. The town could support a hundred times the amount of business it's got. It's towns like this where a big business really pays, isn't it? Where property is cheap, expenses low, facilities good? Isn't that the way they figure?"

"It's the way my father figured when he started the factory, I should imagine."

"And besides, for a rich farming state like this, they haven't got half the elevator business they ought to have. Have they? If the middlemen have to get fifty per cent of the farm income, the least they can do is to turn the business over to home middlemen and keep the profits in the state. Shouldn't you say so?"

"It seeems no more than reasonable."

"There's a pile of money here for any one that goes after it, isn't there?"

"What's the matter with you? Are you trying to sell me the Middle West?"

"No, I just want to find out if I am sold on it myself," Duane explained, laughing. "I haven't got a whole lot of capital left, you know, after my foolish fliers in the last three years. I want to be sure what I'm doing before I go in again. But it seems to me that this town—Well, it's as though it were asleep. Somebody's going to step in here and pick up a few fine spots for factories, a few choice corners for grain elevators, and then after a while sit back and take his exercise clipping coupons. And it seems to me I was just born for a coupon-clipper."

"I wish you luck, my boy. I can't think of a pleasanter indoor sport."

And so while Duane was satisfied to leave the Harmer Motor company to Jerrold's manipulation, Jerrold was satisfied that it should be so, for he knew the young man was keeping a wary eye on things in general, and that when the opportunity came for him to cut loose for himself, this time at least he would be sure of his ground. He told Prudence about it.

"That's nice," she said, warm in her approval. "It's just like families—they do so much better in separate houses."

"You can hardly call him part of the family," protested Jerrold. "The way that girl acts—it's insulting!"

Duane wrote to Jerry. She did not trouble to return the letter by post, she merely tore the envelope across a couple of times, unopened, and handed it to her father.

"Take it down and give it to him, will you?"

"Now, Jerry, have a heart," objected the badgered father. "Why do you insist on dragging me into this thing? Why, it will make him feel like a fool to have me pass it across to him, with the compliments of the house, and so forth. Mail it! Stamps are cheap enough!"

"Daughters are a nuisance, after all, aren't they, father?" she agreed, and went out at once in her little car inspect the cottage on which she was engaged.

Jerrold, thus left with the scraps of the futile correspondence, turned to Prudence.

"What shall I do?" he asked helplessly.

"I don't know," she said gently. "What do you think?"

So Jerrold carried it down to the office and sent for Duane. "It's none of my business, of course," he said. "Don't think I care how much you correspond with the family—and don't blame me—but I don't know what else to do with it. She gave it to me and said to bring it to you."

He passed the bits of paper to Duane hastily as though they burned his fingers. Duane examined them hopefully, saw the unbroken seal of the envelope.

"She didn't read it, did she?" he said dejectedly.

"I don't know, maybe she did," said Jerry's father. "She took it upstairs, and it was quite a while before she came down. Maybe she read it while she was up, and then sealed it, again to fool you. I wouldn't put it past her."

Duane laughed, and examined the envelope more hopefully, but the seal bore no faint trace of tampering fingers.

"I know they say, Never say die, and try, try again, and all that nonsense," Jerrold went on gloomily. "But I don't put much stock in it in this case. Jerry's not a stubborn girl, naturally. If she makes a mistake, she always admits it and rights about face. I don't think she likes you—if you'll excuse me for saying so. And I don't think—"

"You don't need to," said Duane grimly. "But she does like me. And she brought me out here, and by the Eternal, I'll stick if it takes ten years!"

"Well, I think you're wasting your time, my boy, but have it your own way." Jerrold was sympathetic. "I don't understand girls myself. Prudence isn't like that—you can always talk her down."

* * * * * * *

Duane had been in Des Moines one full bitter month without a word from Jerry. And then one morning there was a telephone call in the machine shop, and Duane knew it was Opportunity calling for him by the modern,

"The Starter Won't Work. Will You Take Me In Quickly, Please?"

mechanical contrivance, as it seems she often calls. The boy turned from the telephone and called out to the man in charge of the repair shop:

"Send a tow car for Miss Harmer. She broke down out on Eleventh, other side of the park. She's in a hurry."

Before the man in charge could make a move or give an order, Duane was on his feet.

"Hold up that call a minute," he said with impressive authority in his tone. "I've got to speak to Mr. Harmer. I'll be right back."

He broke into the sacred precinct of the president's office without ceremony.

"Listen, Mr. Harmer," he began with boyish eagerness. "Her car broke down—Jerry's—and she phoned for a tow. May I go after her?"

Jerrold looked at him, laughed a little, shook his head. "Sure you may. And God help you!"

* * * * * * *

Jerry sat patiently behind the wheel of her handsome little roadster, beneath the groaning branches of a great maple, a skeleton in the late fall, and waited for the tow car. Her thoughts were far from the quiet Iowa street. She was away, in Brooklyn, in a little smoke-clouded studio, far up, looking out over East river to the brave lights of New York. She returned to the time and the place with a violent start when the tow car in a cloud of dust swept up abreast of her, and stopped with a crunching and grinding of brakes. She stepped out briskly, with her usual cordial smile for one of her father's employees.

"I can't imagine what's the matter," she began brightly. "It's deader than—" The smile froze upon her face when she met Duane Allerton's eyes, her voice became a still cold thing. "The starter won't work. Will you take me in quickly, please?"

Duane got out and stood beside her. "Why, how do you do?" he said. "I think I met you once before—in Brooklyn."

"I don't recall it."

"Good! Let's both forget it and start afresh! It will be so much better in the end."

"Will you hurry, please? I have a business appointment." She consulted the platinum and diamond wrist watch with a most professional alertness.

"You've changed," he told her, not heeding her words, his eyes on the slender contour of her face. "You are paler. Perhaps you use less rouge here than in the city."

"I don't use any on my car," she said, and turned her back upon him.

Duane got out the chains and fastened her car to his, but when he had finished he came to her again.

"You're just as beautiful as ever," he said softly.

Jerry did not turn her head.

"I'm afraid you will have to sit in your own car to steer it," he said regretfully. "I'm sorry, I'd so much rather have you ride with me, but—"

"I don't mind. I'd rather." She slipped quickly into her place beside the wheel.

He stood beside the car, very close to it, leaning upon the door. She did not meet his eyes.

"Jerry," he said very softly, "don't you think you're treating me very badly?"

She hesitated a moment. The appeal of his voice was a positive pain to her, but Jerry had listened to that appeal before, to her sorrow. Her tone was low, her accents incisively cold as she answered:

"Yes. Why not?"

He could not but smile at the direct conclusiveness of her retort. He turned about and started for the tow car ahead. Suddenly she leaned forward, and called after him.

"Mr. Allerton," she said, and he came back to her with hopeful eagerness. "I wish you would go away again. I was very foolish to send for you. I—didn't realize how it would be. I will pay your way back to New York and give you money enough to—to take care of you—until you get started again—"

"No, thanks, Miss Harmer, I am staying right on in Des Moines," he said quietly, without smiling.

"I—I wish you would go," she said pleadingly. "It—it makes me very unhappy—having you here."

He shook his head. "I am sorry. I have a nice position with your father. I shouldn't think of leaving."

Jerry's chin lifted defiantly. "I shall tell my father to discharge you," she threatened.

"Then when I come begging to your back door, will your maid refuse me a crust of bread to stay my hunger?" he asked lightly.

"If my father dismisses you and offers you a ticket home, you will be glad enough to go."

"If your father dismissed me and gave me a ticket to Heaven itself, Jerry, I would not go without you. I shall never leave Des Moines until I take you with me."

"I'll go away myself then," she cried furiously. "I don't have to stay here—to be insulted—and humiliated—and—"

"I shall wait until you come back, Jerry," he said soberly.

"I'll never come back!"

"Oh, yes, you will come back," he said softly. "As long as your Prudence is here, you will come back."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Her Affliction

Little Millie had achieved great success at her school, and was being moved to a higher grade. Needless to say, her parents were pleased with her and anxious to hear how she would get on in the new class.

When she returned home at lunch time the first question her mother asked was this:

"Well, darling," she said, "how did you like your new teacher?"

"She seems very nice," replied Millie, "but I can't understand all she says."

"How is that?" asked her mother. "Does she talk too quietly?"

"Oh, no, mummy," returned Millie, "but"—with the air of one who knows—"I think she's got a predicament in her speech."

Beat Everything in Sight

Here is a good one about a little lad who was given his first watch the other day as a gift on his ninth birthday. His aunt tells the story.

"Although he seemed pleased," she said, "when he first opened the box his enthusiasm was quite restrained. But he dashed into the house on his return from school that day, and exclaimed jubilantly.

"'My, but I've got a dandy watch!'

"'I'm glad you like it,' said his mother, duly pleased at his pleasure.

"'Yes,' he said, 'It's half an hour ahead of Jim's watch, and it's a whole hour ahead of the clock in the drug store! Gee, it beats them all!'"—St. Paul Dispatch.

Monk Man of Learning

The epithet "Admirable Doctor" was bestowed upon Roger Bacon (1214-1292), an English monk of the Franciscan order. He was without doubt the greatest philosopher of his time. His great work, the Opus Majus, was written about 1265, and first printed in 1733. It treats of nearly all the sciences. He was accused of practicing black magic; and in 1278 a council of the Franciscans, jealous of his superiority, condemned his writings and committed him to prison in Paris, where he remained for ten years. He died at Oxford about 1292.—Kansas City Times.

Community Building

"Dressing Up" School Ground Delights Eye

Town pride, enthusiasm and co-operation can accomplish wonders in beautifying public grounds. Tannersville, in Monroe county, has one of the most beautiful and complete public landscape projects in swing in the whole state. J. R. Bracken, landscape gardening extension specialist of the Pennsylvania State college, is the guiding spirit. Behind it all looms real town pride and enthusiasm on the part of the school board, which decided on the beautification in front of the new consolidated school.

The school board has torn out brush and part of the foundation of an old tannery, installed pipes for draining the surface water, effected a shade tree and plaza approach to the building, all in natural settings, with water prominent in the scene. There is a handsome concrete walk, with two curves, at the front of the school.

Native rhododendron and other growths will make beautiful much of the large space before the school. The plants will be secured near at hand. Of particularly delightful beauty is the bridge walk, on either side of which there are two small lakes. The water is not dangerously deep in either one. Study will be given to water plants and settings for this part of the scene.—Philadelphia Record.

Matter of Planting Trees Along Highways

That ornamental shade or fruit trees, planted at the edge of the right of way of the new roads, would greatly enhance the beauty of the state and add much to the interest of a journey across it has been suggested in a recent letter from G. L. Joyce of Linn county, Mo., which was shown to the Missouri state highway officers of Division No. 2, in Macon, Mo.

The officers were interested, but noted some possible objection to it. Too much shade keeps a roadway damp, and the trees might interfere with the widening of the roadbed or the ditches, unless planted on the extreme edge of the right of way. The falling leaves, too, might increase the autumn touring danger of "leaf skidding."

A beautiful double row of old shade trees borders the lowlands, through which the old toll road from New London to Hannibal runs. Their danger to cars on night runs was lessened by coloring the trunks white. Residents are greatly attached to those ancient trees, and proud of the beautiful vista through them. Tourists frequently stop and take photographs there because of the picturesque view.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Select Colors Carefully

Window sashes, shutters and trim add to the richness if they are painted a deeper, darker color than the body of the building. If the house itself is dark, these parts should be done in a lighter share of the same color, or in cream or light neutral tint. This is a very simple way to get contrast and avoid monotony.

Due regard should be had for the coloring of neighboring houses. Much good effect can be obtained with a little consideration in this direction instead of an indifference which tends to mar the whole outlook. The scheme of the house as viewed from the street should be one of quiet, well-selected colors, so that it may dwell in amity with its neighbors and convey an impression of good breeding and domestic refinement.

Financing the Home

When you are thinking of building a home remember that no matter how carefully you build the first cost is not the last cost. Besides the payments on principal and interest on a home, allowance must be made for some or all of the following expenses: Renewals and repairs, property tax and special assessments, insurance, water tax or rent, accessories, improvements. Some owners also add in the interest they would otherwise receive on the amount of their cash payment or equity.

Good Lights Pay

Recent reports from many cities throughout the United States show that good street lighting accomplishes the following: More business on downtown streets; more buyers from out of town; stronger impression of thrift and progress; fewer overhead wires; better civic pride; help for the fire department; less crime; safer playgrounds; more industries; increased real estate values; more sanitary condition of streets and fewer traffic accidents.

Britisher With Sense

A London hotel discovers its heating system can be used to advantage during hot summer months and keeps it going full blast. It is operated with ice, however. When the hot days come, the pipes are flooded with water from artesian wells and the tanks filled with ice. The circulation of cold water brings down the temperature eight to ten degrees, greatly to the comfort of the guests. Who'd think a British landlord would be the first to try out such a scheme?—Capper's Weekly.

What a Language!

Prince Chicibu, second son of the emperor of Japan, speaks and writes English fluently. Like most foreigners, however, he found difficulty in mastering the English article. His English tutor had explained to him that the article "a" must not be placed before a plural noun. Several days later the prince came to the tutor, carrying the latter's prayer book. "How do you account for this?" he asked in all seriousness, indicating a word with his forefinger. The tutor looked over his royal pupil's shoulder. The word was "amen."

The word impossible is not in my dictionary.—Napoleon.

A Farmer Boy's Success

From hard work on a farm to the study of medicine was the course Dr. Pierce pursued. Finally he determined to put up in ready-to-use form his 'Golden Medical Discovery' so the public could easily procure it. This 'Discovery' is a tonic in its effects on the stomach and digestive apparatus; an alterative in its action on the blood, liver and skin. It increases the appetite, stimulates the digestion, enriches the blood, and makes both men and women feel as they did when they were young.

IOWA TO GET MORE THAN $2,000,000 IN FEDERAL AID

Hawkeye State Is Eleventh On List; Texas Gets Largest Amount

Iowa will receive more than $2,000,000 as the state's share of government funds for use during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1926, in the construction of federal aid roads.

With 73,125,000 apportioned among the 48 states and Hawaii, the amounts were determined by Secretary Jardine. Iowa is the 11th in the list. The amount is $2,060,469.

Texas will receive $4,426,917, the largest share for any state. New York with $3,647,166, Pennsylvania, with $3,346,920, and Illinois with $3,175,616, follow with the next largest shares.

Other apportionments include Kansas $2,027,166; Michigan $2,217,418; Minnesota $2130,168; Missouri $2,406,847; Nebraska $1,588,138 and South Dakota $1,222,198.

TAXI DRIVER A HERO

Milton Allen, a taxi driver in Council Bluffs, distinguished himself during the big fire that wrecked the Grand Hotel and other buildings in that city. The negro elevator boy deserted his post at the breaking out of the fire and Allen immediately sensed the danger of 150 guests in the building and with but little knowledge of the manner of running the elevator he rushed into the cage and turned on the current but to his dismay the elevator plunged into the basement. He reversed the lever and started for the top floor, returning with a cage packed with frightened hotel guests, mostly in their clothes. He made 18 trips with that elevator, finally himself being trapped on the top floor. He had to make his discent upon the fire escape. The taxi driver saved scores of people by his bravery and now a movement is on foot to present his name to the Carnegie foundation as a suitable candidate for a medal for bravery.

Poison Will Kill Destructive Mice

Strychnine and Baking Soda Mixed Together Is Effective.

Field mice have already begun to attack the bark of young apple and peach trees, in spite of the fact that much green food material is still available.

Mounting earth about the trunks of the trees after the weeds and trash have been cleared away, and the use of wire netting or paper protectors help to prevent the damage, but poisoning is the most effective means, advises A. Freeman Mason, specialist in fruit growing at the New Jersey State College of Agriculture.

Poison Mixture.

The United States Department of Agriculture recommends the following formula: Mix together dry, ⅓ ounce of powdered strychnine and ⅛ ounce of baking soda. Sift the strychnine-soda mixture over 1 quart of rolled oats, stirring constantly to insure an even distribution of the poison through the grain. Heat the poisoned rolled oats in an oven until thoroughly warm. Mix 3 parts of melted beef fat with 1 part of melted paraffin, and sprinkle 6 tablespoonfuls of this mixture over the warm, poisoned rolled oats mixing until the oats are evenly coated. Allow the grain to cool and it is ready for use.

If large quantities of the bait are needed, use 1 ounce of strychnine, 1 ounce of soda, 8 quarts of rolled oats and 1¼ pints of the beef-fat-paraffin mixture. It is very important to have the beef-fat-paraffin mixture hot and the poisoned rolled oats thoroughly warm; otherwise it will not be possible to obtain an even coating.

Place Around Orchard.

Tablespoonful quantities of the poisoned oats should be put in open-mouthed containers placed in the orchard. If mice are very abundant, a container should be used under every tree. A small drain tile makes a good container.

All poisoned baits and poison containers and utensils used in the preparation of poisoned baits should be kept plainly labeled and out of reach of children, irresponsible persons and live stock.

High Living Cause of Nervous "Break"

"Nervous breakdowns," Sir William Bennett announces in England, are increasing greatly. Thirty years ago, he says, there was no such thing recognized by the medical profession or the public. Now the number of cases is astonishing.

There is the same situation in this country. If anything, it is worse here. One hears talk nowadays of friends and acquaintances suffering from "nervous breakdowns" just as commonly as one heard of appendicitis cases when that disease was in its heyday. The term used is sometimes a euphemism to cover a downright attack of insanity. Usually it signifies a case of combined physical weakness and disordered nerves, making the victim unable to work effectively and a burden to himself and others.

What is the cause? Apparently the high speed of living. Too much activity of body and mind. Covering too much ground. Not necessarily too much exertion—too much exhausting of energy. And no doubt physical causes play a big part, particularly diet. Possibly half the breakdown cases could be traced to digestive disorders.

If there is one remedy, it is simpler living. This does not mean necessarily retiring from the world or ceasing to do what the world does. It is not so much a question of more poise. The top is most steady when whirling most rapidly. That is a good example of poise.

People live too emotionally, living in their feelings, letting themselves be hauled this way and that, when they might keep calm minds in the midst of action, like the steady driver at the wheel of a speeding car.

The man in calm control of his own mind and spirit doesn't break down. And simple, plain, nourishing food, adapted to the eater's real needs, helps immensely by freeing him from the internal toxins which destroy mental poise and power.—Waterbury Democrat.

CHOOSING BETTER CLOTHES

Marshall County Women Save $2136 By Modern Methods

"Farm women used to ask what was stylish and what caught the eye." Now the selection is their own and adapted to their own characteristics. They choose their materials for dresses with knowledge of what they should wear in color and material. A clerk can tell who has had the opportunity and applied the lessons."

This is the tribute of a clerk of long service in one of the leading stores in Marshall county to the home demonstration clothing project in that county.

As a result of the meetings conducted in this clothing project during the past year, the women who attended report that they saved 2,193 days by using easier methods ond that they saved $2,136.77 by better buying and home sewing.

POISONED BY RABBIT

A bulletin sent out from the State University at Iowa City contains a bit of medical information: "A rabbit lead to a rare disease and discovery of its cure by University Iowa doctors in dealing with the cases of Mrs. C. V. Banes and her son Dean of North England. Dean was dressing a rabbit when he pick[ed] finger on a bone and his mother ished the skinning. It was noticed afterwards that she had a cut on her hand. Both were taken to the university hospital and apparently severe cases of blood poisoning. Their complaint was 'dentified as tularemia, a malady that appeared in California in 1910. It is caused by rabbits and other rodents and was supposed incurable but Iowa doctors cured both cases with mercurochrom. The cooking apparently kills any germs present should a rabbit we infected.

WIND TO BLAME FOR SHENANDOAH WRECK

Final Report on Airship Inquiry Absolves All Involved in Disaster.

Washington.—The naval court of inquiry into the destruction of the naval dirigible Shenandoah was unable to find that any blame attached to anyone in connection with the loss of the airship. The final report of the court, made public here, held in general that the loss of the ship was unavoidable and the price which must be paid in the development of heavier-than-air craft, although it conceded that mistakes had been made.

Errors of judgment were attributed to Commander Lansdowne and other naval officers, but it was asserted that none of these errors was due to negligence. It was recommended that no action be taken against any one.

"Primarily, the loss of the ship was due to large, unbalanced, external aerodynamic forces arising from high velocity air currents," says the report, which is interpreted in popular terms as meaning that a high wind was chiefly responsible.

The court, in deciding points which have received much discussion during the course of the trial, declares:

(a) That the practice of ordering movements of naval vessels, whether battleships or aircraft, for the purpose of complying with public requests, should be condemned.

(b) That the reduction of the gas valves on the Shenandoah was an error of judgment, although it could not be said that was directly or indirectly responsible for the loss of the ship.

(c) That Commander Lansdowne had not been forced to make the western trip against his will and that the commander had not opposed making the flight because of weather conditions.

(d) That the ship was not overweight nor had it been previously strained in a storm.

(e) That deterioration of the material of the ship did not exist and was not a cause of the loss of the ship.

(f) That the judgment of Commander Lansdowne and the bureau of aeronautics in not equipping the ship with the latest type of parachutes was not faulty.

The report also declares that nothing has been brought out during the inquiry which should operate to stop the continued construction of heavier-than-air craft.

Treasury Refunds Large Amount to U. S. Taxpayers

Washington.—Almost 100,000 federal taxpayers shared in $151,885,415 refund out of collections by the Treasury department during the last fiscal year.

The list submitted to the house ways and means committee showed $134,107,773 of the total was returned on account of taxes illegally collected, while $17,777,642 was refunded because of the provision of the 1924 revenue act allowing a 25 per cent reduction on income taxes.

While most of refunds amounted to less than $100, there were many for more than $100,000, and two exceeded $1,000,000.

MUNSEY WILL LEAVES MILLIONS TO MUSEUM

$300,000 Divided Among His Business Associates.

New York.—Frank A. Munsey's will, disposing of property estimated at $40,000,000, was made public here.

Mr. Munsey bequeathed almost his entire fortune to the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

He directed all his properties, including his two newspapers, the Sun and the Evening Telegraph, to be sold within five years. William T. Dewart, business manager of the Munsey properties, issued a reassuring statement there would be no sudden sale or change.

Bequests other than that to the Metropolitan Museum of Art constitute "only a small fraction" of the estate. Chief among them are $250,000 to Bowdoin college, at Brunswick, Maine, and $100,000 to the Maine State hospital at Portland.

Approximately $300,000 is divided among business associates. Mr. Dewart is to get $50,000 and his wife $10,000. R. H. Titherington, who had been with Mr. Munsey nearly forty years, is given $50,000.

Mathew White, Jr., one of Munsey's earliest associates in the magazine business, is given $10,000 and an income of $5,000 a year. Erman J. Ridgeway receives $25,000, and Robert Hobart Davis $10,000. Joseph Brannigan, foreman of the Munsey composing room, gets $10,000.

Prince of Wales May Wed Princess Astrid of Sweden

London.—British society is excited by the announcement that the Princess Astrid, niece of the king of Sweden, is to be the guest of King George and Queen Mary at Buckingham palace next summer. This will be a formal visit, such as is usually associated with a royal betrothal. Society is speculating as to whether at last a bride has been found for the prince of Wales or whether Princess Astrid is intended for his brother, Prince Henry.

Princess Astrid is twenty years old and pretty. She is the daughter of Prince Charles and Princess Ingeborg of Sweden and is a grandniece of the late Queen Alexandra.

HOOVER SAYS 1926 OUTLOOK IS GOOD

Dominant Favorable Factor Is Increased Productivity of United States.

Washington.—That the flood-tide of prosperity which swept the nation in 1925 will rise even higher in 1926, provided "we temper our optimism with a sprinkling of caution," was the prediction of Secretary of Commerce Hoover in a statement issued here.

"On the whole, both our country and the rest of the world face a more favorable outlook at this turn of the year than for a long time past," Hoover declared, adding a warning:

"We ourselves, however, need to be on our guard against reckless optimism. What we need is an even keel in our financial controls, and our growing national efficiency will continue us in increasing prosperity."

Pointing out that the United States produced and consumed more goods in 1925 in proportion to population than ever before, thus resulting in the highest standard of living in history, Hoover takes this view of the future:

"The dominant factor in our outlook is increased productivity, due to fundamental and continuing forces such as the culmination of education, advancement of science, skill and elimination of waste.

"Other favorable indications are that stocks of commodities are moderate, employment exists for practically every one, wages are at a high level, savings are the largest in history and capital is therefore abundant."

Much room for improvement exists in the agricultural situation, according to Hoover. Admitting that the prosperity wave has ebbed somewhat in the farming districts, he says:

"Agriculture generally has not gained a stability that makes for contentment because its basic economic problem of market is unsolved."

Prince Carol Renounces Throne for Italian Girl

Vienna.—A high personage here informed a press correspondent that Carol of Roumania is in Venice with a Rumano-Italian woman with whom the prince became infatuated last summer, and not with his former morganatic wife, Mlle. Lambrino, as has been rumored.

London.—Love, court intrigues and corrupt politics are strangely mixed motives which actuated Crown Prince Carol to renounce the Rumanian throne, according to reports which reached London. His renunciation of the throne is no surprise to his immediate friends.

While one report has it that the dominating factor was his undying love for Zizi Lambrino—from whom he was forcibly separated—other dispatches say quarrels with Premier Bratian contributed to the crown prince's disgust at the prospect of assuming the kingship.

Cram of Bridgewater, said the prospect of his ever regaining the use of the legs was remote.

Grange Head Says 1926 Will Be Good Farm Year

Columbus, Ohio.—The American farmer will have a better year in 1926 than he has had since 1920, L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange, asserted in a speech at the dedication of a grange hall at Alton, near here. Agriculture still faces numerous problems, he said, but it will do well to devote its efforts in the coming 12 months to the development and strengthening of co-operative marketing facilities and farm organizations.

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 83

Your Laxative! Does It Regulate for Weeks?

To Dr. W. B. Caldwell of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, it seemed cruel that so many constipated men, women and children, and particularly old folks, had to be kept constantly "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

While he knew that constipation was the cause of nearly all headaches, biliousness, indigestion and stomach misery, he did not believe that a sickening "purge" or "physic" every day or two was necessary.

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin he discovered a laxative which regulates the bowels. A single dose will establish natural, healthy bowel movement for weeks at a time even for those chronically constipated. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin not only causes a gentle, easy bowel movement but, best of all, it is often months before another dose is necessary. Besides, it is absolutely harmless, and so pleasant that even a cross, feverish, bilious, sick child gladly takes it.

Buy a large 60-cent bottle at any store that sells medicine and just see for yourself.

A pastor, preaching to a former congregation, despite the fact that he had been called to another church some 4,700 miles away, is one of the newest users of the transcontinental telephone system. Rev. R. D. Bisbee, formerly the pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church, Spokane, Wash., not long ago delivered a sermon in Boston which was listened to by his former parishioners in Spokane. TO VISIT GRAVES OF COMRADE DEAD

Plans for holding the 1927 national convention of the American Legion in Paris are being worked out rapidly, according to John J. Wicker, Jr., of Richmond, Va., chairman of the French convention travel committee of the Legion. The committee's arrangements, as already made, were officially approved by the national convention at Omaha, and the committee was authorized to continue with necessary details.

The convention, according to the committee, is to be "the occasion of a great national pilgrimage to our foreign cemeteries, the last resting place of approximately 50,000 of our own comrades, and to the battlefields where they fought and died, and where hundreds of thousands of our comrades suffered their wounds and disabilities. We believe that such a pilgrimage, coming in 1927, the tenth anniversary year of America's entrance into the World war and the creation of the A. E. F., in a real sense would be a 'second A. E. F.' the first A. E. F. having crossed the seas in time of war to aid in the struggle against the common enemy, and the second A. E. F., coming in time of peace, paying solemn homage to our own comrade dead, and promoting international peace and good will."

The latter part of September has been recommended by the committee as the best time for holding the convention. The French government has given assurances that it will place the Trocadero, the largest auditorium in Paris, with a seating capacity of 12,000, at the disposal of the convention.

Participation in the trip will be limited to those who have been bona fide paid-up members of the Legion for both 1926 and 1927, the auxiliary and minor lineal descendants of such members. Official ships will be designated to sail from Houston, Hampton Roads, New York, Boston and Montreal. One-fare railroad rates between the home and the port of embarkation have been assured. Reductions will also probably be given by French railroads. All Paris hotel accommodations of every class are to be held for the disposal of the Legion during the period of the convention.

The minimum round-trip time is estimated at 23 days from the Atlantic seaboard. This will give seven days in France to cover the convention and the pilgrimage. Longer periods and various side trips may be taken.

Savings clubs are being organized over the country so that persons desiring to make the trip may do so without financial difficulty.

UNIVERSAL SERVICE

UNIVERSAL service, the adoption of which by congress is the outstanding point on the American Legion legislative program for 1926, was indorsed by President Calvin Coolidge in his address before the Legion convention at Omaha. The President said in part:

"Undoubtedly one of the most important provisions in the national defense is a proper and sound selective service act. Such a law ought to give authority for a very broad mobilization of all resources of the country, both persons and materials. I can see some difficulties in the application of the principle, for it is the payment of a higher price that stimulates production; whenever it can be done without economic dislocation such limits ought to be established in time of war as would prevent so far as possible all kinds of profiteering.

"There is little defense which can be made of a system which puts some men in the ranks on very small pay and leaves others undisturbed to reap very large profits. . . . In the advent of war, power should be lodged somewhere for the stabilization of prices as far as that might be possible in justice to the country and its defenders."

In Memory of Wilson

A $200,000 memorial bridge over Pearl river, Mobile, Ala., was named the "Woodrow Wilson Bridge" in memory of the war-time President at the suggestion of Henry Graves Post of the American Legion at Mobile. The Legion ordered a bronze tablet placed on the bridge and a portion of the inscription will be a sentence from the address of President Wilson to congress asking for a declaration of war against Germany.

Meets in Philadelphia

Philadelphia has been chosen as the place for holding the 1926 national convention of the American Legion. The Legion gathering, to be held some time in October, will be a feature of the city's observance of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence.

Is Winter Time Your Backache Time?

Does Your Back Foretell Every Change of the Weather? Do You Feel Old and Stiff and Suffer Sharp, Rheumatic Pains?

Then Look to Your Kidneys!

DOES every cold, chill or attack of grip leave you lame, stiff and achy? Are you nervous and depressed; feel tired, worn out and miserable? Does your back throb and ache until it seems you just can't keep going?

Then look to your kidneys! Colds and chills throw a heavy strain on the kidneys. They overload the blood with impurities that the kidneys have to filter off. The kidneys are apt to weaken under this rush of new work, become congested and inflamed.

It's little wonder, then, that every cold finds so many folks suffering with torturing backache, rheumatic pains, headaches, dizziness and annoying kidney irregularities.

If this is the case with you, don't risk neglect! Help your weakened kidneys with a stimulant diuretic. Begin using Doan's Pills. Doan's have helped thousands. Local users testify to their worth. Ask your neighbor!

"Use Doan's," Say These Good People:

JOHN HUFFMAN, retired farmer, 212 N. Fifth St., Harlan, Iowa, says: "A cold settled in my kidneys and caused severe backache. My kidneys acted irregularly, too, and the secretions were painful in passage. A box of Doan's Pills brought me fine relief. My kidneys were strengthened and my back again felt strong."

MRS. ADDIE GOSLIN, Ives St., Clarion, Iowa, says: "I had attacks of backache that made me miserable. Mornings I felt dull and there was a steady ache across my back that didn't let up. Headaches annoyed me, also, and my kidneys acted too often. I used Doan's Pills and they rid me of the trouble."

Cortlandt Bleecker said in New York the other day:

"The recent avalanche of divorces—the Valentino divorce, the Widener-Leidy divorce, the Gloria Gould divorce, and so on—make one think there must be something in the widower's remark:

"'We've missed you, George. Yes, we've missed you dreadfully. You haven't been near the place since your wife died.'

"'Yes,' said the widower, with a smile. 'Yes, I know. But don't worry. I shall marry again.'"

The Klemme high schol boys basketball team and the Klemme alumni team, mixed it up in a fast rough game last Thursday evening at the gym. The alumni came out of the battle with the long end of the score.

Mr. and Mrs. Jake Ter Hark, of Belmond, were visiting at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Carolus, Sr., on New Year's day. Miss Elsie Carolus, who has been helping Mrs. Ter Hark, returned home with them.

The latter part of the week the weather warmed up and Sunday and Monday we had quite a bit of rain fall. Since then we had a few snow flurries and the weather turned a bit colder but it settled.

Mrs. Brooks and daughter, Fern, of Clear Lake, were here for New Year's day, guests at the Henry Lewis home. The ladies are sisters. Mrs. Brooks and Fern returned to the lake Satuday.

The fire whistle sounded the alarm Saturday evening as it was thought fire had broke out on the roof of the G. W. Kluckhohn home. The fire company arrived on the scene in a few minutes and found it was a false alarm and that the chimney was burning out.

Mr. and Mrs. Ben Katter entertained a number of families at their home New Year's day. Those who were present were: Ralph Elder and family; Clarence Larsen and family and Grandpa Larsen; Albert Fuller and family and Alvin Stokesbary and family.

Mrs. Hake was up from Belmond yesterday to pack their household goods and move them out of the flat over the Gruetzmacher store. Mr. and Mrs. Gruetzmacher will move into the ooms over the store as they have sold their home and it has been rented.

Mr. D. B. Waldon and family, of Eldora, have moved into the Frank Gruetzmacher residence. Mr. Waldon is in charge of Mr. L. D. McMichael's office in Klemme now. Mr. and Mrs. Waldon have three sons who will enter the Klemme schools. We welcome this family to our little city.

Al. Emerson left yesterday for Waterville, Minn., where he will work in the W. J. Kalow harness and shoe store. We have known Al for about eight years and we do not like to see him leave Klemme. Mr. Emerson is one of the best harness makers in Northern Iowa and sure "knows his oats." Al is just as handy with a fishing rod as he is with harness tools and we have already made arrangements with him to scout around and locate some good fishing for us next summer.

A very interesting meeting of the Farm Bureau of Twin Lake was held at the farm home of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Greimann on Tuesday, Dec. 29. There were about 100 people present to partake of the big feed prepared by the ladies of the township. A good program was put on by the different districts of the township. After the program the kiddies were given a treat of candy, nuts and a grab bag furnished further amusement for the ladies as well as the men. A business session was then held by the ladies, this being the last meeting held this year. A vote of thanks was tendered the chairman, Mrs. George Luick, for the service she has rendered and work accomplished in the township. All returned to their homes with a feeling of gratitude and a wish for many such occasions.

During the rush of getting out the paper last week we missed this item of news: Mr. and Mrs. G. R. Stokesbary entertained thirty seven people at their home Xmas Day. Those at the Stokesbary home were: Frank Perkins and family, of Garner; Leman Twaite and family, of Garner; Alvin Stokesbary and family, of this place; Mr. Wm. Stokesbary, a brother of G. R., of Aurora, Nebraska; J. F. Stokesbary and family of near Klemme; Clint Stokesbary and family, also of Klemme; Mr. and Mrs. Ted Palmby, of Eldora, Iowa; Harold Leitzinger and family, of Klemme. All the brothers and sisters of the family were present, except a sister of Corwith, who could not be with them. The affair was a sort of family re-union and all had a fine time.

School Nurse Finishing Work

Our nurse, Mrs. Rendleman, is concluding her work here this week and it will be worthless unless parents investigate at once or very soon any symptoms of physical weaknesses that may be corrected We believe they can be trusted to do this in the interest f the child. We hope to be able to begin the new semester next Monday with every physical handicap removed that can be removed If there are any indications of weak eyes that may be corrected with glasses, any teeth that need filling, tonsils or adenoids that need to be removed in order to insure proper development and successful school work, we feel confident parents will attend to these things.

STOCK SHIPMENTS CONTINUE HEAVY HERE

Seven more carloads of livestock were shipped out of the Klemme yards Saturday night for the Chicago market. Of these eleven cars, two carloads were cattle and the balance were hogs. Klemme is the largest stock shipping point on this branch of the Rock Island system. The yards and side tracks were enlarged this summer to accomodate the ever increasing stock shipping business here, and the equipment is now too large to handle the amount of stock shipped from here.

WHAT THE NATIONAL CORN GROWERS ASSOCIATION IS DOING

Meetings Are Being Held All Over The State To Conquer The Corn Situation

Des Moines, Jan. 14.—Consumption of corn products of all kinds is being encouraged by the National Corn Growers Association and many others Those in touch with conditions declare hat the corn surplus in a big production year like the present would disappear if there was a general use of corn meal, corn sugar and other corn foods.

The office of the National Corn Growers Association this past week received an inquiry from the commercial attache of the French Embassy in New York City, Mr. B. Lachelier, in which he asked about the processes used in America in the production of corn meal. He stated he had a correspondent in France who was in the milling business, wished to know how corn meal was made in America. Then Mr. Lachelier said: "The American corn surplus would be easily sold in European countries for in Europe corn is used in foodstuffs on as large a scale as in America."

As a matter of fact there is no corn surplus over a period of five years, officers of the National Corn Growers Association declare, as the statistics will bear out

The organization work and membership drive of the corn growers is continuing with many new members being added. The association sets out as its objects—to secure cost of production and a profit to the corn belt farmers; to stabilize he value of corn belt farm lands; to promote and increase the use of corn and corn products in both domestic and foreign countries; to gather and distribute reliable information covering cost of production, crop acreages, crop conditions, surplus stocks, world market conditions, feeding operations, live stock production; to unite the corn belt on a legislative program tending to insure to agriculture protection equal to that enjoyed by other industrial groups; to assist and strengthen farm organizations and co-operatives functioning in the interests of agriculture in any part of the United States; to create and foser a beter undersanding and a more harmonious attitude between city and farm organizations

A big meeting was held Monday at Centerville directed by the Chamber of Comerce in which work of organizing Appanoose County was inaugurated. There were meetings Monday at Redfield in Dallas county and Yale in Guthrie County.

Tuesday meetings were held at Rolfe and Plover and Wednesday at Gilmore City. Meetings are scheduled for the latter part of the week including one in Bondurant, in Polk county.

THE DAIRY COW

The hen can boast she makes it pay
To set and cackle in the hay.
The sow can loaf, and squel and grunt
And raise ten pigs without a runt.
The dairy cow has this ambition
To feed the babes of half a nation.
A lady fine—a mother, too;
Her family's big—not just a few.
She's foster mother of our race
No hen or pig could take her place
If worthy, why not treat her right
And feed her well both morn and night.
Alfalfa, corn and oats and bran,
Soy beans and silage if you can.
With home grown feeds a good cow must Give lots of milk or else she'll bust.
If she won't milk when these are fed,
Sell her then or cut off her head!

Soviet Russia Now Plans Bigger Wool Production

A Russian family of the prosperous farming peasant class.

The visit to the United States, at this timo, of Michael S. Pereferkovitsh, manager of the live-stock department of the Soviet Russian government, Prof. Michel F. Ivanoff of a Moscow agricultural university, and N. N. Klebnik, official interpreter, carries with it all the significance of a step to progressive and modern methods in the new Russia.

According to these three representatives of the Soviet government, Russia now has about 80,000,000 sheep and hundreds of millions of head of other live stock.

Rambouillet rams have been purchased by them, not to increase the number of sheep, but to improve quality. It is expected that a better grade of wool will be produced by crossing of breeds. In this connection, sheep shearing machinery was bought to supplant the old-time hand blades. This in itself is expected to increase the wool crop about 7%, not because the machine shears closer than hand blades, but because it removes the wool evenly and in an unbroken blanket, leaving no ridges on the sheep.

Russia is anxious to enlarge its textile business with a view to producing its own wool for manufacturing purposes. Another committee from that country has been studying textile mills in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts.

Admittedly, there is great need in Russia for farming implements as the Russian farmer now has practically all the land he wants, but is unable to develop all of his ground because of lack of farm machinery.

Another great need is dairy machinery such as milking machines, cream separators, pasteurizing machinery, horse and cow clipping machines and butter-making machinery.

M. Pereferkovitsh said he intended to buy more than 5,000 sheep, but owing to misinformation as to the best buying season, he arrived in this country too late to get all he wished, and so expects that next year as many as twenty men will be sent to this country to make these purchases.

Russia is doing everything possible to improve farming and dairying methods. Graduates of agricultural schools are teaching farmers and dairymen modern methods and the use of modern machinery.

Many things point to Russia as one of the world's great future sources of dairy products.

LITTLE ELEVATOR SHOWS DANGER FROM DUSTS

A minature elevator designed to be blown up has been built by the Bureau of Chemistry, U. S Department of Agriculture, in order to demonstrate the explosive force of dusts formed in grain elevators, starch factories, and all sorts f plants where dusts are formed.

This little elevator is made of galvanized iron, is painted to resemble concrete, is shaped like a big elevator, and is but little larger than an ordinary suitcase. Inside where one might expect to find bins, conveyor belts, and grain spouts, there is nothing but an electrical arrangement for producing a spark at the touch of a button by the operator. In the roof is a large opening over which a heavy piece of paper is stretched and held tightly by a clamp

In demonstrating the explosiveness of the various kinds of dusts when ignited, the operator measures out a tablespoonful of any dust that will burn (but it should be fine and dry), puts it in the bottom of the elevator, and blows it into suspension by means of compressed air. At the same time he presses the button which produces the electric spark. Instantly the dust-air mixture ignites, the paper roof bursts with a loud report and a flash of flame.

Big grain elevators and other industrial plants are now being equipped to reduce the dust content of the air within their walls and to minimize in other ways the danger of explosions from stray sparks.

METHODIST CHURCH NOTES
A. W. Gauger

Our Sunday school made a very fine showing last Sunday The secretary's record reports 150 present with a marked increase in the collection.

While this is by no means a "high wate" mark, still it is a very fine record for winter attendance, especially when many must come in from the country.

It proves to us that the good attendance is by no means a Christmas affair only but that there is real interest that lasts.

In our preaching service in both churches we had audiences that would be an inspiration to any speaker.

Last Sunday we studied "Our Crime Wave—Its Cause."

Next Sunday morning we will study "Our Crime Wave—Its Cure."

Our subject for Sunday evening will be, "Jonah."

We have found some of Jonah's relatives and kinsfolk in and about Klemme and we shall try to learn to know them better next Sunday evening.

A glad welcome awaits all who attend.

The man entered a store. "Have you an adding machine?" he asked

"No, sir," answered the clerk, "but we have some nice counters."

MANY CANDIDATES IN COUNTY POLITICAL RUN OF 1926

KLEMME BREAKS EVEN IN GAMES WITH VENTURA

Klemme Alumni Girls Have Record Of No Defeats This Year

Klemme and Ventura high schools took one apiece in the battle on the local gym floor last Friday evening.

The Ventura girls and the Kleme Alumni girls started the contest with a 3 to 2 score for Klemme in the first quarter. Klemme continued to keep the lead and outclassed Ventura in basket shooting and passing. The half ended 13-7 for Klemme. The third quarter 27-9 for Klemme, and the game ended Klemme 31, Ventura 14.

The Klemme boys did not fare so well and could not seem to get organized The first quarter was a close score of 5 to 4 for Ventura, and was "nobody's game."

Klemme played in tough luck and should have evened things up on free throws, but failed to make any ringers. The half ended with 13 to Ventura's credit and 6 for Klemme.

The third quarter was again an even game and Ventura gathered 6 scores and Klemme rung up 4 more

The last quarter the local cagers played Ventura a tie game and began to get back a little form. Each team gathered in six points, but the final score was 25 to 16 in favor of the visitors when the whistle blew.

The general dope had been that Klemme would have "easy pickin's" in the Ventura game. However, a slip in the cogs somewhere put the Klemme machine out of time and the boys had a streak of tough luck getting baskets.

Don't criticise too much, a good team can't win all the time and often are easily beaten. The boys will come back strong and will win.

Come out and boost for them at every opportunity, both at home and away.

1tc PETER JOSTEN, Sec'y.

If you don't know M. A. Fell, you don't know Hancock County, is the way we would put it. Marion is a candidate for Representative from this county and he will make a big dent in the votes at the June Primaries. Mr. Fell is one of the early pioneers of Hancock county and had much to do with its development. In the early days he was always the first man to offer help and put over an improvement for the betterment of the settlers. Mr. Fell is qualified for the office he seeks; he has good business ability, knows the needs of the farmer as well as the business and professional man and will work for the betterment of all in this agricultural district.

WILL HAVE PLENTY MATERIAL FOR JUNE PRIMARIES

Many Candidates Have Not Announced For Office, But Will

When June 8 1926, rollos around, the voters of Hancock County will have plenty of good material from which to choose officers to run the county affairs for the next two year term.

The Times this week has quite a list of candidates for various county offices. A few candidates have not yet placed their announcements in this issue but it is safe to estimate that the list will easily double or be tripled in the next few weeks as we believe there will be plenty of competition this year for all offices of the court house.

Mr. Chris J. Johansen, who is at present filling his first term as our Clerk of Courts, is again in the field seeking a nomination for a second term. Chris has proved to be an efficient officer and no doubt will be given a second term without any opposition. as is customary when an officer proves his worth in this county.

Mr John Suurballe, county treasurer places his announcement in the Times this week for re-election to that office Mr. Suurballe is perhaps the busiest official in this county as the treasurer's office has been piled up with more work each year Mr. Suurballe has been a most effecient officer and handles the enormous business in his office in a most careful and accurate manner Reports show that his office checked up as one of the best in the state

R. W. Sinclair, of Garner, is an entire new man in county politics, as this is the first time he has seeked a public office in the county. Mr Sinolair is a candidate for the office of county auditor, and if elected he no doubt can conduct the business of that office in a satisfactory manner. He has been a resident of this county for a long number of years, he has a good business training and has been active in various enterprises.

A. O Christensen, supervisor at this time seeks to be re-elected for another term, his second. Mr A. O Christensen made a fine run in the last campaign and won out against strong competition. No doubt he will be given a second term in his office.

Fern Peck Katter, of Garner, this week announces that she is a candidate for the office of Recorder of this county. She is a daughter of the late M. E. Peck, of Garner, who perhaps was the best known man in our county, being a pioneer in the implement and threshing machine business Fern Katter is well qualified to take charge of the office she seeks She has been a teacher for a number of years in both town and rural schools and holds a first grade certificate. She is deserving of the office and will be a strong contender for Recorder

Another man known to most of the people in the county is Mr. Herb Gartin, of Garner, who this week announces that he will be a candidate for the Sheriff's office Mr Gartin has had a great deal of experience in this office as he has served as a deputy sheriff for some time.

It will be remembered that our board of supervisors appointed Mr H. C. Meyer, of Britt, to fill the vacancy in the auditor's office Mr Meyer is serving his first term in that capacity and seeks a second term He is well qualified and has conducted the office in an efficient manner.

Clarissa Peterson Abel, who at present is serving as County Recorder, this week announces that she is a candidate for that office. She has been a good official and has kept the records of her office in the best condition. Her many friends will rally to her support.

U. S. TO BACK CROP BOARD WITH CREDIT

Dickinson and Jardine Agree on Terms of Relief—Iowa Calls Meeting.

Washington.—Agreement on a definite legislative program to establish a government system for marketing surplus crops to aid the farmers of the West was reached by representatives of the Coolidge administration and the farm bloc.

For the first time since the Iowa corn surplus problem centered the attention of Washington on the farmers' distress, Secretary Jardine and Representative L. J. Dickinson (Rep., Iowa) came virtually to complete understanding.

The plan agreed upon follows the terms of the bill introduced by Mr. Dickinson.

It provides for creation by congress of a federal farm board having power to designate some agency to handle the surplus of any crop. The agency so selected would serve as a co-operative society to dispose of the surplus by export, any loss to be met by the farmers who join in the plan and whose surplus is thus disposed of.

The program does not require any expenditure of government money nor does it intend that the government shall either buy or sell the surplus, it is said.

The only financial help the government offers is to permit the agency designated by the proposed farm board to borrow money from the intermediate credit banks. The money to e collected by the member farmers will be security for the loans.

Des Moines, Iowa.—Iowa's committee of fifty called a conference of the eleven corn belt states for late this month to harmonize the demand to congress for farm relief legislation. The conference will concentrate on a plan for a federal export corporation to dispose of surplus corn.

New Turkish Law Hits American Manufacturers

Constantinople.—Turkey has withdrawn its most-favored-nation treatment of the United States. The significance of a new law issued at Angora on December 20 was realized only recently. The Turks published the fact that all nations not having commercial treaties ratified would be subject to a 60 per cent increase in import duties.

Hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of American goods already are tied up in the bonded warehouses in Constantinople. The consignees refuse to accept the goods because they are forced to pay the increased cost, which will enable the British, French, German and other merchants to sell their wares at less than half the American prices.

Woolworth Heiress Sells $10,000,000 Worth of Stock

New York—Barbara Hutton, fifteen, sold $10,000,000 worth of Woolworth Stores shares and still has the bulk of the stock left to her in 1924 by her grandmother, the widow of F. W. Woolworth. The 50,000 shares were sold privately by Goldman, Sachs & Co., and Lehman Brothers, at, about $200 a share, involving at least $10,000,000 in all. The little girl has still 54 per cent of the stock inherited after deducting the amount of stock that has been sold.

Famous Vanderbilt Home Is Sold for $3,500,000

New York.—The north half of the famous Vanderbilt twin houses occupying the block fronting on the west side of Fifth avenue, between Fifty-first and Fifty-second streets, was sold for about $3,500,000 by Mrs. Henry White, wife of the former ambassador to France and a daughter of the late William H. Vanderbilt, to Benjamin Winter, a real estate operator.

QUAKES CAUSE TERROR IN ITALIAN TOWNS

Cold Saves Paris From Being Inundated by Flood.

Rome.—A violent earthquake which shook Tuscany for 12 seconds, causing casualties and property damage and a renewal of protentous activity in Mount Vesuvius marked a reawakening of Italy's seismic and volcanic forces.

Both these phenomena are believed to be results of the same mysterious subterranean forces which during the past ten days in various parts of the country have caused panic-stricken crowds to flee as the earth trembled or the famous volcano belched angrily.

The towns suffering most were Abbadia and Sansalvatore.

Paris.—Colder weather throughout France and the decrease in rainfall caused optimism that the floods will not menace the capital this time, although suburbs and upriver towns are badly inundated.

M. Demonzie, minister of public works, personally investigated the measures taken to hold back the floods from Paris.

The party proceeded to Tremblay, where the race track which served as temporary home for thousands of Yanks waiting to go back home in 1919, is located. There he witnessed the rescue of a dozen girls from a school by firemen who plunged through waist-high water and carried them out when a parapet suddenly gave way a quarter of a mile up the Marne, permitting the water to isolate the building.

Union Miners Seek New Conquests in Indiana

Evansville, Ind.—Union mine organizers, claiming victory in their organization campaign in this district, are preparing to move on to the Princeton territory to carry on their program there.

The situation in Evansville has not changed since the mines closed down and James H. Moore, manager of the local unions, and Harvey Cartwright, vice president of the Indiana district of the United Mine Workers of America, are holding conferences with the view of opening the diggings. The men have been deadlocked.

The "peaceful invasion" of the union men has resulted in no disorders.

Charter Denied Garland for His Colony of Love

Allentown, Pa.—Plans of Charles Garland to use his $1,000,000 legacy in establishing a love colony as an experiment in social science encountered an obstacle when a master appointed by the court refused to recommend a charter for the undertaking and denounced its promoters.

Garland recently purchased a 200-acre farm in Milford township, which now houses a dozen followers, who have renounced conventions.

Robert L. Stuart, the attorney acting as master, examined the incorporators, several of them women, who now live on the farm, and declared they were unfit persons to conduct any such experiment.

AGREE TO ARBITRATE ALL RAIL DISPUTES

Employees and Roads Favor Mediation Board to Avert Strikes.

Washington.—Backed by President Coolidge, the major railroads of the country and their employees perfected an agreement for arbitration of all disputes to prevent possibility of serious railroad strikes.

The agreement, produced through conferences recently, is regarded by the President as the most important truce between capital and labor ever effected in this country.

Fifty railroads have approved the plan.

Every road in the country will be subject to it. About 1,700,000 employees, in all branches of railroad industry, are affected.

The plan is understood to provide:

Abolition of the railroad labor board.

Establishment of conciliation and arbitration boards on all roads between employers and employees, with representatives of the public.

Creation of a national conciliation board which will investigate any labor trouble which the roads and employees are themselves unable to settle.

An agreement by law that neither side will act by lockout or strike during the investigation and for 30 days after publication of the report.

Representation of the roads employees and public on the national conciliation board, which will also have authority to arbitrate, at the request of the parties.

Berlin's Bride Fails to Attend Vanderbilt Wedding

New York.—Mrs. Irving Berlin did not attend the wedding of Miss Consuelo Vanderbilt to Earl E. T. Smith although when she returned to the city she had announced that she planned to attend.

While the couple were being married at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, before an assembly that included Clarence R. Mackay, her father, the former Miss Ellin Mackay remained at home with her husband.

No explanation of why she failed to be among the guests was obtainable.

Throughout the day the composer and his bride, constantly in the spotlight since their sudden marriage at the Municipal building, stayed within Berlin's bachelor apartment atop 2 East Forty-sixth street.

Reports that Mr. Mackay had disinherited his daughter could not be verified. A published story that Berlin had settled $1,000,000 upon his wife was denied by a business associate of the composer.

Operators and Miners Confer on Peace Plan

New York.—With the announcement that their conferences have not resulted in any definite conclusions the anthracite operators and miners are continuing their deliberations. Alvin Markle, the neutral member of the conference, is credited with holding the conferees together in the hope of some favorable development.

The negotiations therefore remain in the situation of being dragged on the chance that a change of stand by one side or the other may make possible for the six representatives of the miners and six operators to reach an agreement which will end the strike.

Says America Must Grow Rubber to Avert Shortage

Washington.—Insisting that the country is faced with the necessity of a "war measure" as a result of the rubber situation, F. A. Seiberling, founder and former president of the Goodyear Rubber company, declared that America must grow rubber under her own flag, in testimony before the house committee on interstate and foreign commerce. The country stands most in need of a sound rubber-planting project in the Philippines, he said.

Five Injured When Shell Explodes on U. S. Warship

San Pedro, Cal.—The explosion of a defective shell aboard the battleship Oklahoma while the war vessel was engaged in anti-aircraft practice off Catalina island resulted in the injury of five men. Frank P. Ryan of Chicago, seaman first class and gun captain, was the most seriously injured. He will lose sight of one eye and was burned about the body.

THE AMERICAN LEGION

(Copy for This Department Supplied by the American Legion News Service.)

DOYLE NOW LEADS FORTY AND EIGHT

If you see two virile young fellows clad in chaps and all the rest of the accepted cowboy paraphernalia going about a convention city of the American Legion and "shooting up the town" just to add zest to the occasion, 10 dollars to doughnuts that one of the redoubtable pair setting off the blanks is Stanley M. Doyle, better known as "Larry." The side-kick and pal of the man who is now chef de chemin de fer, or chief high mucky-muck of Forty and Eight, honor society of the American Legion, is Carroll E. Griffin.

"Larry" Doyle, however, we have it on good authority, is neither cowboy nor gunman. He's so tame that, though he now lives in Montana and heads the cowboy, pony-riding delegation from the state up in the mountains, he was born in Minnesota and spent a goodly portion of his life among the cornfields of Iowa. He attended the grades and high school at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and it is not of record that his cowboy passion for fun had asserted itself at that early date, at least in its convention-parade, cow-pony fashion.

Spending three years at St. Thomas college at St. Paul, he entered the employ of the Rock Island railroad. After two years with the Rock Island he joined the transportation department of the Northern Pacific at Glendive, Mont.

Enlisting in the air service at Omaha in 1917, he was assigned to the school of military aeronautics at Austin, Texas, and later to Kelly field at San Antonio. He later served at Camp Dick and at Fort Sill. He was discharged at the latter place in February, 1919.

He then enrolled in the college of law at Drake university, Des Moines, Iowa. After completing his course in May, 1922, he returned to Glendive and began the practice of law. He was elected city attorney in 1923 and holds that office at present.

Soon after its organization, the new chef de chemin de fer joined Argonne post of the Legion at Des Moines. He was transferred later to Dawson post No. 28 at Glendive. He was post historian and then for three years a member of the post executive committee. He has been department historian and is now department vice commander of Montana. In the Forty and Eight he has risen from chef de train of his local voiture at Glendive to grand chef de train, cheminot national and sous chef de chemin de fer and then to chef de chemin de fer, to which position he was elected at Omaha in recognition of his outstanding services.

More Than One Million Boys to Play Baseball

Detailed plans for the junior world's baseball series are being worked out by the national Americanism commission of the American Legion. Arrangements for the series, which is to be held at Philadelhia in connection with the national convention of the American Legion, are being developed by Frank Clay Cross, director of the commission, in conjunction with Dr. George W. Orton, director of sports for the sesquicentennial celebration here next year of the signing of the declaration of Independence.

Leagues will be organized by Legion posts throughout the country. Contests will be held in local communities, congressional districts, by states, regions and then by sections. Winners in the four sectionals, eastern, central-southern, middle-western and western, will cross bats for national honors at Philadelphia.

Officials of the National Amateur Athletic federation, who are deeply interested in the plan, estimate that 1,000,000 boys will be drawn into play the first year's competition. They anticipate that the total number of boys to be interested in the game of baseball during the first year as a result of this competition will reach more than 1,000,000.

Fight on Waste Saves Millions

Simplification and Standardization Accomplishes Much.

Washington.—Hundreds of millions of dollars have been saved for American manufacturers, distributors and consumers as a result of the campaign for waste elimination, simplification and standardization inaugurated five years ago by the Department of Commerce. The actual saving cannot even be approximated and Secretary Hoover, in his annual report, says that what the country as a whole has accomplished in increased national efficiency in these directions is impossible of measurement, although it represents one of the most astonishing transformations in economic history."

While the government has been aiding actively in the campaign in many specific directions the whole program has been one fundmentally to stimulate action among industries, trades and consumers themselves.

"It is obviously not the function of government to manage business," says Mr. Hoover, "but to investigate economic questions, to survey economic phenomena and point out the remedy for economic failure or the road to progress, to inspire and assist co-operative action and to stimulate forces to these ends—surely all these are well within the proper field of public service."

229 Committees at Work.

Since this work was undertaken some 900 group conferences have been held under government auspices, practically all at the request of the industries themselves, and 229 committees are now at work on various phases of the program.

Discussing the fundamental purposes of the campaign for waste elimination Secretary Hoover says the philosophy underlying it has but one purpose—that is, to maintain American standards of living for both workers and farmers and to place production on a more stable footing. The high standards of living enjoyed by the American people are the result of steadily mounting per capita productivity, he says. There is only one way further to advance these standards, and that is by improved methods and processes, by the elimination of waste in materials and motions in our production and distribution system.

"Just as 20 years ago we undertook nation-wide conservation of our natural resources," continues Secretary Hoover, "so we must today even more vigorously sustain this campaign of better nation-wide utilization of our industrial resources and effort. More especially is this the case in view of the many complex forces which have arisen from the war, and particularly the difficulty of maintaining our situation as against the competition of a world of lower standards overseas."

What Has Been Attempted.

The major directions of this effort which the commerce secretary has been leading for half a decade include:

The elimination of waste in railway transportation by the provision of adequate facilities and better methods; the vigorous improvement of our inland waterways; the enlarged electrification of the country for the saving in fuel and labor; the reduction of the periodic waves of unemployment; an improved statistical service for industry; the reduction of seasonal employment in construction and other industries and of intermittent employment in such industries as bituminous coal mining; the development of co-operative marketing and better terminal facilities in agricultural products in order to reduce the waste in agriculture distribution; the stimulation of commercial arbitration in order to eliminate the wastes of litigation and the reduction of the waste arising from industrial strife between employers and employees.

The reduction of waste in manufacture and distribution is to be brought about through the establishment of grades, standards of quality, dimensions and performance in nonstyle articles of commerce, through the simplification in dimensions of many articles of manufacture and the reduction of unnecessary varieties, and through more uniform business documents such as specifications, bills of lading and warehouse receipts.

Since the co-operative service was inaugurated, more than fifty simplifications have been achieved by the industries and trades concerned, resulting in an average reduction in varieties of 73 per cent. Among these eliminations of varieties, thirty-one apply to products of iron, steel and other metals; eight to lumber, paper and other products derived from wood; seventeen to clay, cement, glass and other products of a mineral nature, and four to textiles.

The annual value of manufactured goods affected by these simplifications runs well over $2,000,000,000, it is declared.

A striking illustration of the need of this work is found in the case of one product, single bit axes. Formerly these axes were produced and marketed in thirty-four models, four grades, thirty-five brands, eleven finishes and nineteen sizes, and the total varieties of the thirty-four types actually purchasable were 6,118. Simplification and standardization have not been completed, but the results will be comparable to those in other lines.

For instance, where there were 4,460 sizes or varieties of shovels, spades and scoops in use, only 384 are now retained, a reduction of 92 per cent. Wovenwire fence packages have been reduced from 2,072 to 138, or 94 per cent; metal lath from 125 to 24, or 81 per cent; files and rasps from 1,351 to 496, or 63 per cent; forged tools from 665 to 351, or 47 per cent; range boilers from 130 to 13, or 90 per cent; tacks and nails from 428 to 181, or 58 per cent, and packing weights of tacks and nails from 423 to 121, or 71 per cent.

On the whole, builders' hardware has been reduced from 34,806 varieties and sizes to 10,648.

Car Shortages Disappear.

For the transportation industry it is reported that the elimination of waste has done much toward the provision of adequate transportation. The periodic car shortages of many years past have practically disappeared, although the tonnage load has increased more than 25 per cent since 1921. Average weekly car loadings in that period have increased from 693,533 to 986,475; the number of miles per day from 22.4 to 26.9, and the average trainload from 656 to 731 tons.

For the building, 37 varieties of smooth-face brick, 38 of rough-face brick and 44 of common brick have been reduced to one variety of each; hollow building tile have been reduced from 36 to 19, roofing slate from 98 to 48, concrete building units from 115 to 34, and so on.

Secretary Hoover also calls attention to figures from the Department of Labor showing that whereas in 1920 the wage rate was 99 per cent above the prewar level and the wholesale price level, 126 per cent above prewar, in 1924, the wage rate had risen to 218 above prewar, while the wholesale price level had dropped to 30 per cent above prewar.

Comparable figures show that the British wage rate in 1920 was 130 per cent above prewar, and the wholesale price level 183 per cent above prewar, while in 1924 wage rates and wholesale prices had dropped to 70 and 74 per cent, respectively, above prewar.

"While wages are higher in the United States than in 1920, wholesale prices are lower," says the secretary. "We thus have the highest real wage in our history and we have had three years of remarkable price stability."

EERIE FIRE OF THE WAVES FAIRLY COMMON PHENOMENON

Luminescence Caused by Oxidizing or Burning of Particles of Dead Animal and Vegetable Matter.

Washington. — "Phosphorescence bright enough to make newspaper headlines readable, which was recently encountered by the navy aircraft tender Patoka in the Gulf of Mexico, is a fairly common phenomenon in many parts of the world," says a bulletin from the Washington (D. C.) headquarters of the National Geographic society. "The ghostly, eerie fire of the waves, however, has nothing to do with the substance that goes into the manufacture of matches, despite a remarkable resemblance and an obvious derivation of name.

"For, although sea water contains salts of phosphorus, called phosphates, it has no free, uncombined quantities of the element. Luminescence, the name preferred by recent investigators, is a more appropriate term, as the light is largely the result of the oxidizing, or burning, of minute particles of dead animal and vegetable matter, the oxygen being derived from small amounts dissolved in sea water.

In addition there is a phosphorescence of living organisms. Several varieties of protophyta, tiny single-cell plants that float on the surface of the water, diffuse the dull glow called 'milky sea' in the Far East, or 'white water' of the Gulf of Aden. Certain forms of bacteria are also luminescent, and are often visible on sand and on fish cast up by the sea. This glow is not due to decay, for when decay sets in, its luminescence ceases.

"Some forms of sea fire are highly incandescent, giving off an intense, almost white, light. Sometimes it is difficult to believe that one would not have one's fingers burned by touching it. Others are golden yellow, blue, and even red and green, giving weird, uncanny effects on dark nights. It may have been from some such inspiration that Coleridge drew the 'atmosphere' for 'The Ancient Mariner.'

"Norwegian fishermen distinguish between two kinds of the phenomenon: 'dead phosphorescence' and 'fish phosphorescence.' The former resembles stars in a clear sky, myriads of tiny, nearly invisible, points emitting a scintillating light; now increasing, now decreasing, in intensity. 'Fish phosphorescence' consists of great bubbles of light caused by fish rushing through the water. The fish disturb minute phosphorescent organisms, which flare up suddenly in response to the irritation produced.

"It is the latter variety that so delights the visitor to strange lands and waters. It is this phosphorescence that gives the midnight wave tops their brilliant sparkle as they break on the shore, or bathes the oar in a magic glow as it ruffles the surface, or leaves the cometlike track of the stone dropped into the water."

Community Building

Modern City Getting Away From Old Ideas

Occasionally there are reproduced from the magazines or newspapers of past periods the somewhat crude woodcuts which portray more or less faithfully street scenes or buildings indicating conditions in the then sparsely settled sections of some of the larger American cities. They are studied with much the same interest one devotes to the contemplation of a daguerrotype of some more or less famous ancestor, says a writer in the Christian Science Monitor.

Strangely enough, in nearly every one of these former villages and cities which have lost their identity as separate units through the merging and coalescing process to which they have submitted, gracefully or otherwise, more than a semblance of the once boasted Main streets remains. Another century or more must pass before these ancient landmarks will be obliterated. But their complete elimination is forecast by the increasing trend toward centralization. Great industrial and commercial units are still being welded and compressed into more and more compact form. Beyond these there possibly will spring up new centers, each with its own Main street, the converging point of residential villages peopled by auto and tramcar commuters. But these new streets will not be replicas of the old. The hitching posts and racks will be absent. The corner blacksmith shop will be nowhere visible. Even the rivalries which once existed among neighboring communities to determine which should be greatest will be forgotten.

Co-operation Is First Step in Advancement

Interests of a community and the public utilities serving it are identical, according to Philip L. Thompson, president of the Association of National Advertisers.

He told of manufacturers searching for a factory site. "When they find a city where for political or other considerations the utilities are not being allowed franchises and rates sufficient to enable them to earn a fair return, they turn away, because they are looking for locations where there is community harmony, where the people have learned that their interest is a mutual one with their utilities.

"When labor and employers of labor," Mr. Thompson continued, "and the merchants and the chambers of commerce and the Rotary and Kiwanis clubs and the public utilities and the city or county officials and granges learn the value of sitting down around the table on a give-and-take basis, then there is no power on earth strong enough to hold back the development of that community."

Dry Rot in Timber

Dry rot in the timbers of the buildings of our country is a menace of great magnitude and yet little is done to eliminate this disease. Its causes are well known, also its habits and effects, but the property owners seem willing to run chances of having their buildings undermined by this disease, and then pay the cost for demolition and rebuilding. Dry rot can be prevented if proper precautions are taken to destroy the fungi.

The losses suffered by property owners from this disease are unbelievable, and more unbelievable is the fact that no effort is being made to prevent these tremendous losses. Recently in England, the Royal Institute of British Architecture has appealed to the British Science school for discussion on this subject, which they feel is of national importance. It would seem that not only architects, but property owners as well should combine and take immediate steps to preserve the buildings of the nation.

Home-Town Faults

It is a time-honored American tradition that a man must never speak anything but good of his native town. He must blind his eyes to its faults; or, at least, he must never say anything about them. This is the tradition that has given rise to Boosters' clubs, to slogans of "Boost—don't knock" and the like. Not a bad idea, this praising your home town. Civic patriotism is a fine thing. But many times the highest form of civic patriotism lies in criticising your town for all you are worth. Faults don't drop out of existence if they are ignored. The only way to make a town all it ought to be is by calling attention to its defects until people are ready to abolish them. Boosters are good. But sometimes a good knocker is worth a lot more.—Frankfort Morning Times.

Individuality in Houses

Many feel that duplication of house designs in a row is conducive of economy. Perhaps it is, so far as first cost is concerned. But is it ecohomy when it is considered that higher prices could be asked for houses whose exteriors were all different designs, with an attempt made to create an architectural composition out of an entire row of such house units? Correct planting of trees and shrubbery would add immeasurably to the value of building operations, and lend to them that feeling of restfulness so generally lacking.

Modern dyestuffs can be just as fast and give just as beautiful colors as any used in past times, says the U. S. Department of Agriculture. It is sentiment chiefly that makes us cling to the idea thatt he natural dyes obtained from plants and animals are best. Many of them are lovely colors, iti s true, and the time that has passed since the cloth was dipped in the dye pot, has in many cases mellowed the tones and made them even lovelier. Many of the so-called artificial dyes used now are exactly the same from the chemical standpoint as those from berries and bark and other natural sources. In some cases the new dyes are better than the old. The modern manufacturer of dyestuffs knows exactly what is in them, and for that reason is surer of results.

SORT BREEDING FLOCK NOW

This Is Excellent Time To Start Improvement of Methods

The poultry keeper has more time now to improve his flock than at any other season of the year. Methods which may be started at this time for flock improvement include the separation of the best individuals into a special breeding pen, from which eggs may be selected for hatching.

Eggs should not be used from the breeding pen until the birds have been in there at least a month. It is absolutely essential that plenty of milk and green feed be provided to the birds in the breeding pens in order to insure the production of eggs with a high percentage of fertility and hatchability.

HANCOCK COUNTY FARMERS NOW GET PREMIUM ON HOGS

PREMIUM NOW PAID ON HANCOCK COUNTY HOGS

Farmers Can Now Demand An Extra Ten Cents Per Hundred

Meat packers will now pay 10 cents a hundred premium on Hancock County hogs. This is allowed because the county has been declared a modified tuberculosis area, as it has less than one-half of one per cent tubercular reactors on the last test.

Klemme farmers, and others in the county can get the added premium by making proper application. Blanks must be filled out and an affidavit made certifying that the hogs were bred and fed in Hancock county

The blanks are distributed by the board of supervisors, but can be procured at the First National Bank in Klemme, or any other bank in this county, or from your shipping agent or live stock buyer. If they do not have them now see to it that they get them at once.

Henry Helps is the first farmer in this vicinity we know of who has received a premium of ten cents extra per hundred. His premium amounted to over $20 on one load.

Wheat in Dairy Rations Is Highly Recommended

Recent low farm prices of wheat and the relatively higher price of bran and other grains and by-product feeds have produced an interest in the feeding value of wheat for live stock. As wheat is usually too valuable to feed to dairy cattle unless unfit for milling purposes, few dairymen have had experience in feeding it.

Ground wheat, while not as palatable as other cereal grains, due to the fact that it forms a sticky mass in the mouth, still is an excellent feed. The grain can be crushed instead of ground and, when fed in a grain mixture with bulky feeds, this objection is largely overcome.

Wheat contains practically the same amount of digestible carbohydrates, but considerably less fat than corn. Wheat is slightly richer in digestible protein, but is slightly lower in total digestible nutrients.

As compared to wheat bran, whole wheat contains less protein, but almost 25 per cent more total digestible nutrients. While bran is light and bulky, whole wheat has the opposite characteristic. Therefore, bran does not replace wheat as well as does corn.

Cows Will Produce More if Fed Much Roughage

"Better Feeding for Dairy Cows" is the title of a new bulletin by Purdue university. The bulletin says in part:

Dairy cows will be better fed and will produce much more profitably if:

1. They are fed all the roughage they will eat.
2. Most of their dry roughage is made up of such legumes as alfalfa, clover, soy bean or cowpea hay.
3. They are fed silage during the winter.
4. Their grain ration contains enough protein supplement to give it balance.
5. Cows are not expected to obtain too much of their feed from pasture, but are fed when pastures become poor in the summer and are taken off of pasture when it becomes poor in the fall.

Cows Crave for Wood

A craving for wood does not necessarily mean that a cow is in need of a tonic or medicine. Cows will sometimes develop a habit of chewing on foreign substances like that and they are very hard to break. The habit is started sometimes by the lack of salt which causes the cow to chew on something that has a salty taste. Provide plenty of salt with a balanced ration and plenty of good drinking water and it may be that the cow will forget her habit.

PRUDENCE'S DAUGHTER

CHAPTER VII

—14—

In Jerry's Citadel.

Jerry announced a sudden desire to visit her twin aunts in Mount Mark, down in the southeastern part of the state, and Prudence, with her usual gentle willingness to please, acquiesced at once though with secret reluctance, for Jerrold said he could not possibly accompany them, and pleaded business as a reason. In all the years of their marriage, Prudence had never left him without reluctance, nor returned to him without joy.

From the hours of her earliest recollection, Jerry had assumed a solemn share of her mother's responsibility for all the aunts, and for their husbands, and their children, their homes and their bank accounts. Had not her mother brought them up? Prudence had accepted Jerrold and Jerry as a bountiful, beautiful dispensation of a generous and loving Providence, and in them felt only an implicit confidence and joy But her sisters were a sacred trust, accepted in all solemnity and retained with unfaltering fidelity, and Jerry, in all things part and parcel of her mother's life, shared deeply in that obligation almost before she could talk.

So when Jerry said briskly, "By the way, mother, we'd better run down to Mount Mark and see what those twin aunts are up to," Prudence could only yield.

Carol was Jerry's favorite, a fact she tried with kindly intention to conceal from the general knowledge of the family. She loved the quiet hush of Carol's life, and found a thrill of exultation in the knowledge of the gentle widowhood that followed the riotous youth of the merriest and most mischievous of all the aunts. The tender immersion of her entire life in that of her orphaned baby, Julia, after the frivolous vanities of her gay girlhood, seemed to Jerry a thing divine.

Baby Julia herself, now grown to a moody, misty-eyed, dream-enwrapped girl of fourteen, had fascinated Jerry from the first, and never more than at this time in the light of her new wisdom and understanding. Jerry looked at her keenly, noted the murmurous, far-away tone of her voice, remarked the subtle depths of her dreamy eyes. She shook her head ominously.

"You keep an eye on that girl, Aunt Carol," she said warningly. "You keep an eye on Julia."

And when Carol laughed at her, telling her that Julia had never given her an anxious moment in all her life, that she could read her inmost soul like a printed page, Jerry grew only more anxious.

"Um, that's the kind," she said. "The thing you think is her inmost soul isn't soul at all. It's just a little borrowed cloud put on to hide what's going on inside—like a smoke screen."

"Jerry, that's not nice," protested Julia's mother. "Julia has nothing to hide from anyone. She is the most honest child, the least deceitful, the—"

"Oh, it isn't Julia's fault," Jerry interposed quickly. "Don't think I am criticizing Julia, by any means. She doesn't know what's going on inside her, any more than you do. She'll be as much surprised as anybody one of these days."

And later she said, "Perhaps, after all, I'm just born to be a gorgon lady with snaky locks to feed the fires of somebody else's talent."

And when her aunt did not understand, and said she did not enjoy riddles, she explained, incomprehensibly, after this manner:

"I think she's got it, poor child! The divine spark! It will burn her up."

"Prudence, what in the world is she talking about?" Carol turned to her sister for enlightenment.

"Genius," went on Jerry moodily. "She's the only one of the tribe that has the earmarks, but it sticks out all over her, and believe me, Aunt Carol, I know the symptoms. Such a pretty girl, too. Isn't it a shame?"

"Of course she is a genius," said Carol complacently. "Everybody says so. Why, she's been writing poetry, and books, and plays—even tragedies where everybody dies and commits suicide—ever since she could hold a pencil."

"I knew it," said Jerry despondently. "I felt it the minute I looked at her. I'd rather have the measles, myself. Well, we'll just have to make the best of it, Aunt Carol, so try not to worry about it. If it proves too much for you, I'll back you." And then she said: "I learned one thing. The gods seem to scatter their good gifts with a free and lavish hand, but I tell you they demand payment in full. For every genius, a human sacrifice. Blood, I tell you, heart's blood! A mother, a lover, a friend, somebody has to be offered up on the altar of every talent."

Carol looked at Prudence. "She's sick, poor child. You ought to do something for her."

Jerry laughed. "Don't worry about me. I'm no genius and thank God for it. I'm just a commonplace maker-over of other people's houses, and I'm glad of it—and making money, into the bargain. But I know what I'm talking about. To keep a genius going, a human heart must feed the sacrificial fires. And if I'm not much mistaken, poor dear little Julia will be calling for kindling one of these days."

Carol and Julia went with them to the country to visit Lark and Jim on their lovely Iowa farm. Lark's three children Jerry inspected with solicitous interest, pronounced them very nice, very healthy and quite human, thank God, and washed her hands of them. But she hovered constantly over Julia with a passionate pity which sent the aunts off into peals of merry laughter and exasperated Julia herself into seething fury.

It was pleasant to be in Mount Mark, among the old friends, in the old home, discussing old days and deeds with the mischievous members of the parsonage family. They talked of Fairy and Gene, they talked of Connie and Prince and their miraculously golden trafficking in oil.

The twins said it seemed strange that Connie had remained away when Jerry was in New York, that she had gone so suddenly and remained so long. And when she was alone with her sisters Prudence said, slowly:

"You mustn't think Connie was neglecting Jerry, girls—in any way. You see, they had been talking of making that trip, anyhow, so—I just wrote and begged them to go at once—and to linger as long as possible."

The twins stared, then laughed, then lightly shrugged their shoulders. "We might have known it," was what they said.

"But Prudence," protested Lark, when she had thought it over, "she could have made it so pleasant for Jerry."

"Jerry didn't go to be pleasant," Prudence defended herself. "She went to be free, and she said herself she couldn't be free if we put her in Connie's care. Besides—if her life lay there, she would have found it. But if there was nothing for her in New York—I wanted her back. And no one but Jerry could find that out."

Prudence and Jerry had left Des Moines on the early morning train, about half past six or seven. At half past nine that same morning, Jerrold called Duane into the office.

"How's business?" he asked cheerfully.

"Fine. I'm learning the trade from the ground up. I picked up four tools and a can of oil yesterday," said Duane.

"Prudence and Jerry have gone down to Mount Mark to visit the aunts and cousins. How would you like to come up to the house and stay with me in their absence? I can only admit, with all due modesty, that we have a good cook."

Duane flushed with pleasure.

"I'd like it, if you're sure I won't be in the way," he said with great eagerness.

"Not a bit. I'm glad to have you. The house is like a morgue without them—they talk so much."

"You know I don't really know Jerry very well," Duane explained cautiously. "I'm only in love with her, that's all."

"You're sure of that, are you? Sure it's not just a little infatuation that lingers on—from pique—because she remains recalcitrant."

Duane shook his head. "I'm sure. Surer than death since I met Prudence." And then on a sudden thought he said, "You—you are sure Prudence will not mind."

"Prudence suggested it, my boy, Prudence suggested it." And he added dryly, "When you've known Prudence as long as I have, you'll know that she has a nasty habit of thinking of things first."

They went over to the hotel at once and got Duane's bags and then drove out the lovely avenue toward the great house, showing broad and white among the bare maples that hedged it on every side.

Jerrold led the way into the living room, where Duane had sat once before with Prudence, and called Katie.

"We're going to have Mr. Allerton with us while the family's away," he explained amiably. "Now look after him nicely and make him comfortable. And tell Mary I've been bragging about her cooking. Mr. Allerton is a particular friend of Miss Jerry's, you know."

Katie smiled broadly. "I know," she said, with the respectful, friendly familiarity of long and devoted service. "I heard her tell you about him over the telephone."

Both men laughed, and Duane blushed boyishly.

"Well, he's a friend of mine anyhow, so be good to him," said Jerrold. "And mind you say nothing to anyone—"

"Oh, no, Mr. Harmer, I wouldn't." She smiled toward Duane with pleasant sympathy and curious interest.

Jerrold took Duane's bags and led the way up the wide comfortable stairs. "This den in the end of the hall is Jerry's idea," he explained, indicating the beautiful lounge at the head of the stairs. "She says it seems so sordid just to divide a house with a hall—so presto—a lounge. We've built the house over three times on Jerry's account. When she was born, to make her a nursery. When she grew up, to get rid of it. And the last time when somebody gave her The House Beautiful for a Christmas present, to make the magazine look like thirty cents. She says she did everything that the magazine made fun of, just to show it up. This is where we hang out."

He led the way across to the wide, bright, charming room he shared with Prudence, and Duane looked about it with pleasure. But Jerrold frowned.

"Women are—well, women are certainly—Sometimes I think I don't know Prudence very well, but then, what can you expect? We've been married only twenty years."

Duane watched him, laughing, said nothing, while Jerrold stalked grimly out into Jerry's stairway lounge and returned dragging with him a heavy, bronze smoking stand.

"I have many bad habits," Jerrold went on gloomily. "One is that I will smoke every morning before I get up. Prudence doesn't approve of it. So every morning in the twenty-two years of our connubial bliss, she has lugged my smoking stand out in the lounge where she says it belongs, and every night I lug it back before I go to bed. Twenty-two years of it!"

In the Confident Assurance of the Joyous Eyes, He Saw Jerry.

Duane laughed in keen enjoyment.

"Last thing she did before she left was to trot that stand out of the bedroom. Knowing all the time the minute I got home, I'd trot it back."

"Prudence does not smoke, I infer."

"Jerry doesn't either—here," said Jerrold quickly. "Mostly the nice women don't—here. It didn't seem to take in the Middle West. Jerry did in college a few times for fun—all the girls do—and she told us she smoked a great deal in New York. But she doesn't here. We didn't tell her not to, mind you. Prudence says even daughters are free souls when they grow up. She's got a stunning little stand that some sculptor made for her in New York—a beauty—uses it for pins."

And then, with that gentleness of instinct that made Jerrold Harmer the man that Prudence could adore throughout her life, he said:

"That's Jerry's room across the hall. Go on over and have a look, while I tell Mary about dinner. It's very cute."

"Do—do you mind?"

"Not a bit. It's worth seeing. We did it over to suit her—you know—in opposition to The House Beautiful. I'll be up in a minute." And he struck off downstairs whistling blithely.

Duane waited until a door closed behind him somewhere below, and then he crossed quickly to Jerry's room.

Involuntarily, he smiled. How could he have failed to recognize the incongruity of her gaudy black and orange surroundings in Reilly's alley? This room breathed of her, it sang of her—soft and warm, subtly fragrant with some elusive perfume. He knew instantly, in spite of the presence of the two maids, that Jerry was expected to do her own room. The wastebasket had not been emptied. And lying among the silken cushions of the day bed, lay a soft rumpled bit of lavender and lace—a handkerchief idly tossed and carelessly left there.

He walked slowly up the three steps that led to the day bed, a pretty throne-like dais, with hangings of royal blue velvet, and he stood beside the silk and velvet couch that served as a bed for Jerry at night, looking down at it somberly. He lifted the bit of linen and lace and touched it to his lips and smiled at his own folly, telling himself he was getting to be a sentimental fool.

There were but two photographs in the room, those of Prudence and Jerrold, handsomely framed in blue and gold. No countless snapshots, no schoolgirl chums, no pencilled sketches, just the two pictured faces she loved the best. Among the amber and golden articles on her dressing table lay a strand of crystal beads lightly dropped.

There was only one picture upon the delicately tinted walls, and this surprised him, representing as it did the thought of one who had studied Art. It was a great green and white ocean, giant waves lashing themselves into foam and spray.

There were built-in book shelves all over the room, and hundreds of books—fairy tales, poetry, philosophy, love stories, wild adventures. He smiled at the breadth of interest displayed by the assortment and looking more closely he saw that it represented epochs—new shelves having been added to accommodate the changing taste of increasing years. There was a book of poems in the window-seat, lying open, face down. He smiled again when he noticed among those on the shelves an occasional protruding bit of lace, or delicately colored linen. Obviously it was a favorite trick of Jerry's to mark her place in a book with the handkerchief she was using. Duane was boyishly pleased to have discovered this trait of hers, alone and unaided, in her absence.

Turning about suddenly he lifted his eyes and started violently. He was directly opposite the rioting ocean of green and white and saw it clearly for the first time. He felt abashed as though it were Jerry herself, white, unashamed, who rode the waves before him. He looked away, curiously confused, embarrassed, and then went back to it. He stared at it, studied it, the slim white figure high and untrammeled on the highest wave.

In the confident assurance of the joyous eyes, he saw Jerry—Jerry as he had seen her first, as she stood with Aimee Glorian in Carter Blake's studio—with the warm welcome of her youth in her eyes—Jerry, a-thirst for adventure, for romance.

When he heard Jerrold whistling on the stairway again, he went out quickly and closed the door.

That same afternoon Jerrold took him out to see Jerry's houses. Duane was fascinated with this phase of Jerry's life. He had never dreamed she could do a thing so clever, he marveled at it, rejoiced over her success as though he were in some way responsible for her skill. He asked a thousand questions about it, the management, the financing, the profits.

"That settles it for me," he said decidedly. "I'm going to turn in on Iowa real estate. I'll buy up old wrecks of houses for a song, turn them over to Jerry to gild them with her fairy wand, and we'll both sit back on the cushions with the coupons! Pretty good, isn't it?"

"Yes, very good. The only objection that I see is that you don't seem to be on any too pleasant terms with your prospective collaborator in the coupon business." Then Jerrold went on soberly, "It would be a shame for her to give it up—even for the sake of acquiring such a matrimonial prize as I am sure you would be. She is crazy about it—and she is doing something worth while, too. All over town they are talking about it—nobody dreamed she had such stuff in her. I didn't myself. Prudence says—but you know Prudence."

"She won't have to give it up," Duane said, with as much assurance as though he had a final voice in the disposition of Jerry's future. "I wouldn't have her give it up for anything. It's the cleverest thing I ever heard of—and a girl like Jerry—you just wouldn't believe it! For the most part, I must admit I think the Iowa barns are a little more esthetic looking then the Iowa residences—but of course it's a farm state—sweets to the wage earner, you might say."

"It isn't as if we couldn't afford a softening of the atmosphere, as Jerry calls it. There is money enough here for anything. The state is rich, almost too rich. But you know how we are, we Middle Westerners. We had such a tussle with nature in the beginning that we have sort of forgotten how to make ourselves comfortable. These retired farmers have money to burn. They can pay for anything they want, but they don't realize what they want until some one—like Jerry—shoves it right onto them."

"Then all I have to do now is to get clubby with Jerry," Duane said. "I see our future. I buy up factory sites and inveigle big business into using them—and Jerry dolls up their houses!"

Introduction of Straw Hats

The recent heat introduces the subject of straw hats and straw-hat stories. In 1796 a chancellor of the exchequer imposed a duty on hats. All headgear made of "felt or wool or beaver or any leather or japanned hats," came within the scope of the tax. But an Edinburgh merchant, astute enough to observe that straw was not included in the legal enumeration of materials used, introduced straw hats to Scotland for the first time, early in the summer of 1798. Unfortunately for the enterprising hatter, an amendment to the act, within a few weeks, rendered the popular tax-evading novelty liable to payment. The act, which remained in force until 1811, allowed exemption to nightcaps.

The Law's Delay

The longest lawsuit I have ever heard of is one that was started in the Ninth century—and it is still going on! It crops up periodically in the republic of Andorra, in the Pyrenees, and relates to some property referred to in a contract drawn up over 1,000 years ago. The laws of Andorra are in a somewhat undecided state, and there is no immediate prospect of the case being settled. The lawsuit is thus about a thousand years old.—Tit-Bits.

Scraps of Humor

A NEW ALIBI

A colored convict had received a Bible from the chaplain, but the very next day was haled into the prison's own court, charged with petty thievery.

"How does this happen?" asked the chaplain sternly. "I just sent you a book in which there is a commandment, 'Thou shalt not steal.' Didn't you receive it?"

"Yassuh, yassuh," replied the negro. "But Ah ain't had time to git dat fur yet."

Our climate is a series of surprises, and among our many prognostics of the weather the only trustworthy one that I know is that when it is warm, it is a sign that it is going to be cold.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

GOOD THINGS TO EAT

A nice bit of cake to serve with a cup of tea on an afternoon is:

Date Bars.—Take one cupful each of nuts and sugar, two well-beaten eggs, one cupful of flour, with two level tablespoonfuls of it removed. Add one-half teaspoonful of baking powder, one cupful of washed, stoned and quartered dates, and one-half teaspoonful of cinnamon. Mix all together and bake in square tins. Dust the tins well with flour after greasing and spread the mixture evenly over the tins. Bake in a slow oven twenty-five minutes.

Chicken a la Reine.—Cream two tablespoonfuls of butter, add the yolks of three hard-boiled eggs, rubbed to a paste. Soak one-fourth of a cupful of cracker crumbs in one-fourth of a cupful of milk and add the egg mixture. Pour on gradually one cupful of chicken stock. Then add one cupful of finely minced chicken. Season with salt, paprika and celery salt. Serve on toast.

Pepper Soup.—Take six or eight large red peppers, remove the seeds and the veins and cook the peppers until tender. Put through a sieve and add a cupful of boiled rice, season with salt and tabasco sauce. Beat one egg with half a cupful of cream, add it to a quart of milk, heated hot, combine mixtures and serve poured over toasted squares of bread; serve immediately.

Braised Liver.—Wash two pounds of fresh liver and flour well, seasoning with salt and pepper and a little lemon juice. Lay in a casserole; add two sliced onions and six carrots shredded lengthwise, a bayleaf, a sprinkling of parsley and a pint of boiling water. Place thin slices of bacon over all; cover tightly and bake one hour and a half; then remove the cover, baste and brown ten minutes. Serve with tomatoes or chili sauce.

Chicken Jelly Salad.—Soften one-half teaspoonful of gelatin in four tablespoonfuls of cold water, add to one cupful of boiling chicken broth, stir well until dissolved, adding salt, pepper, onion juice and celery salt to season. Chill until cold, then add part of this to a cupful of finely chopped cooked chicken in layers with the broth as it hardens, adding cooked egg, cooked carrots or beets cut into small shapes to decorate. Let each layer become firm before adding another. Serve unmolded with mayonnaise dressing.

Try this prune pie: Bake a pastry shell and fill with stewed prunes, sprinkle with nuts, cover with whipped cream and serve.

Food for Any Season.

There is no more delicate or appetizing meat dish than tongues, well cooked and seasoned.

Beef Tongue en Casserole.—Take a tongue which has been slightly corned, remove all the rough portions, rub with flour to which has been added a dash of allspice and a pinch of ginger. Fry a few slices of salt pork, then add a sliced onion and the tongue. Tie the tongue into shape and flour lightly on all sides. Prepare a cupful of gravy made from the broth of the trimmings, add the juice of a lemon, three tablespoonfuls of shredded almonds, and half a cupful of seeded raisins. Put the tongue into a round casserole, pour over the gravy and bake half an hour in a moderate oven. Untie the tongue, serve on a hot platter with the gravy poured around it.

Raisin Sandwiches.—Put through the meat chopper alternately a few raisins which have been steamed until plump and a few walnut meats or pecan meats until a cupful of each is ground. Add a dash of salt and blend with enough whipped cream to make a mixture to spread.

Cream Prune Pie.—Put a cupful of stewed prunes through a sieve, add a cupful of milk, one teaspoonful of cornstarch, a third of a cupful of sugar, the yolks of two eggs well beaten, a pinch of salt; mix well and pour into a pastry-lined plate. Cover with a meringue and bake all together if the crust has been previously baked, cook the filling first then add meringue and bake.

Ground Steak Birds.—Cut strips of round steak, flatten by pounding until thin. Place on each strip a slice of onion, a slice of pickle and a slice of bacon. Roll up and tie with a string. Dust with salt and pepper and brown in a little hot fat. Simmer until tender, never allowing the gravy to boil. Serve with the gravy poured around the rolls, after removing the strings.

MODISH LINGERIE FOR SERVICE; SCALLOPS RIVAL THE FLARE

NOW in the after-holiday lull is the time to take inventory of one's lingerie supply. Whether one does it through the buying or home-sewing method new combinations, step-ins and costume slips must be acquired, if one would keep up with fashion's pace. In underthings as well as frocks and outer wraps styles change. This season more than ever there is a notable difference in many of the undergarments. This is greatly due to the introduction of fullness about the hemline which takes the place of the heretofore slim silhouette.

Modish Spring Lingerie.

To meet this new condition the designer of pretty undergarments must, through subtle adjustment, make necessary concessions. For instance, the latest idea is to introduce godets of lace into the skirt portions of combination costume slip and gown.

Youthful slips not only emphasize skirt brevity but they also substitute a fitted bandeau top for the low-waisted effects which once prevailed. In models for more developed figures the slender line is retained, wide flouncing or lace forming the flare.

As to trimming there is a decided trend toward using net and footing. Even the hem about the ankles shows a dainty finish of ruffled footing, often matching the net insertion which joins the seams. Net or valenciennes insertion would be equally effective for a combination such as the picture shows.

A whimsical touch to colored voile undergarments is the edging of black footing. Peach, maize, rose, blue or orchid filmy step-ins or combinations can be made of sheer silk or voile with black footing finishings at little expense, and this home sewing is a most delightful pastime when midseason snows have not yet melted and indoors seems so enticing and "comfy."

Very charming also in the lingerie collection are combinations of georgette decorated with ribbon applique.

Paris says, "Let scallops reign supreme in costume designing," and they do, judging from the multitudinous number of gowns and wraps and two-piece dresses which are greatly bescalloped this season. It is a question whether scallops or flares are receiving most attention from noted couturiers at present. According to late models emanating from various renowned French ateliers, the honors are divided.

The illustration presents a very attractive exponent of the scalloped frock, also the newest interpretation of the flare.

Arranging scallops in tiers is an outcome of the trend of the vogue for scallops and then more scallops. This lovely model is of flat crepe in a fashionable old rose shade. It bears out the fact that all soft and unusual colorings will be called into play for spring and summer frocks.

The decorative scallop has made its appearance on the two-piece frock, in interesting ways. That is, the blouse carries a scalloped hemline matched to that of the skirt. Sometimes only the jumper is scalloped, the skirt adopting a circular flare. It is remarked that in most instances when the silhouette conforms to straightline models, then scallops are brought into play as a trimming.

As to the flare its interpretations are too versatile to enumerate, but one instance is of unusual outstanding interest—namely semi-fitted princess lines which ripple into a flare at the hemline after the manner of the smart street dress pictured to the left. This rather extreme style is characteristic of the coming mode.

Showing the Scallop and the Flare.

Highway Material Tests Being Made at College

At the request of the state highway commission, a small temporary wooden barracks has been built behind the Engineering building of the University of Wisconsin to be used as a highway testing laboratory. Tests of various highway materials are now being carried out by the university and the commission.

Samples of road material are tested in the laboratory for straight compression and for cross binding strength. Some of the tests are made on roads under construction in order that the mixture may be of the proper consistency. The sample is put in a frame along the edge of the road and then tested on the roadbeds. The result is later examined in the laboratory.

Roadbed samples are also tested during regular intervals of varied periods of days or weeks, and some are put away to be tested after a year or two.

Good Road Notes

Experiments are being conducted by the Illinois state highway department to determine what is the best grass mixture to grow along the shoulders of the state aid roads. Several different mixtures have been worked out, and a number of experimental strips several hundred feet long are being seeded for study and observation.

Seven and one-half million dollars will be spent on roads in national parks during the next three years, Steven Mather, director of national parks for the United States government, told members of the Motor Car Dealers' association of Los Angeles. A comprehensive picture of national park development was drawn by Mather and his assistant, A. E. Demarary, for the automobile men.

The real good that a good roads movement can do will never be realized to the full until China has been persuaded to accept the idea.

Road improvements in 16 states of the South will cost $40,000,000 this year. North Carolina is developing one of the finest highways in the country—a hard-surfaced road running from Wilson to Jacksonville, a distance of 165 miles. When completed, this highway will be the longest asphalt road east of the Rocky mountains.

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 83

A Child's Laxative Which Mothers Can Rely On

To Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, it seemed cruel that so many constipated infants and children had to be kept "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

While he knew that constipation was the cause of nearly all children's little ills, he constantly advised mothers to give only a harmless laxative which would help to establish natural bowel "regularity."

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin mothers have a regulating laxative which they can depend upon whenever a child is constipated, bilious, feverish or sick from a cold, indigestion or sour stomach. All children love its pleasant taste.

Buy a large 60-cent bottle at any store that sells medicine and just see for yourself how perfectly it cleanses and regulates the bowels of infants and children.

KLEMME CAGERS WIN TWO FAST GAMES THE PAST WEEK

ALEXANDER AND RENWICK NEW SCALPS ON K. H. S. BELT

Renwick Plays Return Game Here Next Tuesday Night

The Klemme High School Basket Ball Team has added two more victories to their string of scalps during the past week.

Friday night Coach Hockey took his warriors to Alexander where they gathered in an easy victory over the boys there by a score of 25 to 19.

Tuesday night the local cagers invaded Abe Lauritzen's camp at Renwick to meet the new enemy on their own floor.

Coach Abe Lauritzen had his cagers well schooled and they gave our boys a royal battle right from the start. At the end of the first half Abe's team had us licked by one score, 8 to 9. Our boys held a council of war and planned out the last half of battle, determined that Renwick's scalp should hang in the Klemme camp.

Our boys held Abe's team for no field goals and Renwick only added on two points, while Klemme cleaned up seven counters, making the final score Klemme 15, Renwick 11.

One feature of the game was the strong defense put up by Klemme as Renwick made only one field goal during the entire game, making the other nine points on foul throws.

Renwick will invade the local cagers floor next Tuesday night. Come out and see these teams work. We are all interested in the Renwick team as it is coached by a home boy, let's give him and his team a royal welcome.

McNIDER HAS GOOD SCHEME TO USE SURPLUS CORN

Substitution For Cano And Beet Products Would Open New Market For Corn

Annual consumption of between eight and ten million pounds of rn sugar will be the United States army's contribution to the solution of Iowa farmers' corn marketing problem, if Assistant Secretary of War Hanford McNider succeeds in an undertaking on which he has embarked.

The assistant secretary is making an investigation to determine whether it would not be advantageous to the army as well as to farmers to have the Procurement of Supplies Division of the army specifiy that corn sugar should be supplied for use of the enlisted personnel of the nation's military forces.

Annual consumption of sugar per man is estimated by Colonel McNider at about 75 pounds, making the average annual need of the army between eight and ten million pounds. Heretofor the specifications of the supply division have called for cane or beet sugar.

Officers of the supply division have told Colonel McNider that sugar from corn is only three-fourths as sweet as is sugar from cane or beets. This disadvantage, however, is said to be overcome by the superiority of corn sugar over its competitors as a food, the claim being made for dextrose, the sweet quality of corn, that it has none of the diabetic properties of sugar from cane or beets.

It is also said that the lower price of corn sugar, as compared with the cane and beet sugar, will justify a more generous use to make up for its deficiency in sweetness.

Colonel McNider has asked the supply division to investigate the feasibility of substituting corn as an army standard food, and intimates that a change may be ordered if the inquiry now under way justifies it.

The United States is the richest country in the world, and the people of New York receive 15 per cent of the vast income of the country.

THORNBURG RENEWS FIGHT FOR CORN SUGAR

M. G. Thornburg, Secretary of Agriculture of Iowa, feels that W. M. Jardine, United States Secretary of Agriculture, has overlooked some very essential points in his refusal to permit corn sugar to be used in manufactured products without special label.

In Mr. Jardine's refusal, he laid special emphasis on established custom and usage Mr. Thornburg's letter shows that federal ice cream standards have not been changed for 20 years and that they do not comply with present day custom or usage.

"It is our contention," states Mr. Thornburg, "That it should be optional with the manufacturer as to whether corn sugar is used or not in the manufacture of different products on acount of the fact that if it is used, it adds to the merit of the article and does not deteriorate its food value."

Blue Valley Creamery Institute

RECENT agricultural college experiments show that skim milk is the cheapest and best protein supplement for growing pigs, according to the Blue Valley Creamery Institute. Notable among these experiments was the one conducted at the Minnesota College of Agriculture, which emphasizes the importance of feeding the skim milk on the farm in producing cheap pork as another source of income to the dairy farmer. Ten pigs in one lot receiving tankage as the protein supplement required 307 pounds of corn to make a gain of 100 pounds at a feed cost of $7.79, whereas when skim milk was used in place of tankage ten pigs in another lot required only 201 pounds of corn to make a 100-pound gain at a cost of $5.48. At prevailing prices for corn and tankage, these trials gave 100 pounds of skim milk a feeding value equal to 11 pounds of tankage and 25 pounds of corn. Furthermore, the pigs receiving skim milk reached a weight of 83 pounds in two weeks less time than was required by the tankage-fed group and at a reduced cost of $2.31 per 100-pound gain.

IOWA CREAMERIES MAKE 18 PER CENT MORE BUTTER

Iowa creameries manufactured 25,000,000 pounds more butter from July 1, 1924, to June 30, 1925, than was ever manufactured in the state in any previous year.

During this period there were 159,763 farmers who were patrons of 448 creameries. They milked 1,124,899 cows, or an average of seven cows per farm. This shows that over three-fourths of the farmers of the state are patrons of some one of the 448 creameries.

The total production of creamery butter for the year was 165,836,178 pounds. The average production of butter-fat per cow was approximately 140 pounds per year. One of the big needs of the dairy business in the state, is for heavier production per cow which will aid in cheapening the cost of production.

OUTLOOK FOR 1926

Des Moines, Jan. 21.—An abundance of old corn, plenty of oats and a shortage of hay, cattle and hogs, is the general situation on Iowa farms, as shown by the figures of the Weather and Crop Service of the Iowa Dept. of Agriculture. A moderate increase in spring pigs and young cattle is desirable and a little of the corn land turned back to grass would tend to a better balance.

After the spring of 1926, further expansion in hog breeding had better be done with caution. Much will depend on the corn crop of 1926. Not even the United States Weather Bureau, with its half century of meteorological experience and trained staff, can say whether or not 1926 will be a good corn year.

S. U. I. PROF. WANTS TO MAKE BUTTER CHURNING EASY

He Says Butter Fat Is Held Like A Nut In A Shuck

Farmers' wives may not always have to juggle cream about in a barrel or slap it by the hour with a dasher in order to make butter of it, according to Prof. Gilbert Houser of the University of Iowa, who points out that the turning of cream into butter and buttermilk by chemical means would seem to be possible.

The Iowa expert explains that the butter fat in milk and cream is held captive by the protein, or whiter part of the mixture. He believes that means will be found to force this protein to give up its butter fat without subjecting it to the beating that farmers' wives call "doing the churning."

"Milk is a natural emulsion," the professor says, and explains that by an emulsion he means a combination of two substances together with a liquid so that the one substance surrounds the other. In milk, butter fat and protein are the two substances, and the protein surrounds the butter fat as a nut shuck surrounds the nut or an egg shell encloses the egg.

Professor Houser declares that the churning process is simply dashing together these little ball-like pieces of protein and butter fat swimming in the milk. Eventually the protein shells become so beaten about that they break, freeing the butter fat and allowing it to collect.

This is removed as butter, leaving the water in the milk and the broken down protein shells to become buttermilk. Iti s the hope of Professor Houser that some method will be found whereby the protein shells can be broken without the extended churning process, in this way bringing many hours of leisure to farmers' wives.

Start Two New Test Associations

TEST MERITS OF CORN SUGAR

Could Replace One-Fourth Of Sugar Used In Average Home

Corn sugar can be used very successfully and economically in the preparation of many dierffent foods, and replace about one-fourth of the cane or beet sugar used in the average home, in the opinion of Dean Richardson, Home Economics Division, Iowa State College. However, the chemical and physical differences between corn sugar and cane sugar need to be kept in mind if corn sugar is to be substituted successfully.

The following are some of the fundamental facts which Dean Richardson says should be observed in using corn sugar: Corn sugar is only four-fifths as heavy as cane sugar and from one-half to three-fourths as sweet So for equal food value, the volume (or measure) should be increased about one-fourth and for equal sweetening should be approximately doubled.

In foods where much sugar is used and in which the sweetness and texture of the finished product is of first importance, such as cakes and candies, complete substitution of corn sugar has not been satisfactory Where large amounts of sugar are used, there is difficulty because of the tendency of corn sugar to become sticky. In cakes which contain fats and in doughnuts and jellies, it can be substituted up to 25 or 50 per cent with satisfactory results and in caramels, fudge, fondant, to 20 per cent; in ice cream, to about 60 per cent.

At high temperatures, especially if alkali is present, corn sugar tends to become dark in color and bitter and so can be substituted only part in baking mixtures which contain large amounts of sugar Greater substitution is possible if sour milk is used, and probably also if a little vinegar or lemon juice is added. The use of corn sugar alone in hot breads, griddle cakes and waffles has given better browning and so is preferred. It is not satisfactory in mixtures in which milk and sugar are to be heated together.

The college expects to publish soon the results of rather extensive investigations made on corn sugar in its home economics laboratories.

METHODIST CHURCH NOTES

A. W. Gauger, Pastor

All services for the coming Sunday will be held per schedule.

We were glad to observe a number of "entire families" with every member of the family present, in service last Sunday. It was a pleasing sight to see them sit in family groups. These parents have the right conception of rearing family, for our preaching service is not for adults only but for the whole family.

We hope that others will follow this spendid example.

Mr. Milton Schaper was our preacher man in Liberty church last Sunday. He is one of Liberty churchs own boys who is preparing for the ministery in Morningside College He was here on a intersemester furlough.

His many friends were glad to see him. He gave a helpful sermon.

BUILDING AND CONTENTS WERE ENTIRE LOSS

Cause Of Fire Not Known; Building Ablaze When Alarm Was Turned In

The fire siren sounded the alarm at a little past four o'clock this morning when Paul Mueller discovered the Stille Implement Company building was a mass of flames Mr Mueller rooms at the Kirkwood boarding house accross from the Stille Implement Company and is in the habit of getting up early to start the fires at the creamery. He saw the blaze from his room and immediately gave the alarm and got out the fire truck.

The building was a solid mass of flames along the south side when the fire company got on the scene and nothing could be done to save the building. A tin roof on the shop kept the flames down and helped to prevent their spreading. Men assisted in carrying out several tons of salt blocks which still could be reached Machinery, oil, etc., was impossible to reach and practically all the contents of the building was destroyed

The firemen devoted their efforts to saving the Lew Lewis residence close by and other buildings which were in immediate danger.

The night was cold and some time was lost in getting the hose strung out and connected as the first hydrant tapped was frozen shut and the line was then connected to another hydrant a block further down.

By five thirty the building was consumed by fire and nearby buildings were out of danger.

We do not know the amount of the loss; part of it was covered with insurance. The building and stock are a complete loss, outside of what was protected by insurance.

BLAME TARIFF FOR FARM DEPRESSION

Immediate Revision to Give Agriculture American Prices Asked.

Chicago.—Governor Small's farm relief conference, held at the Hotel La Salle here, followed up the action of the agricultural meeting at Morris, Ill., recently, and adopted a number of the resolutions passed there. Revision of the tariff law in the interests of agriculture and immediate provision for the handling of crop surpluses were demanded, with the blame for the farm depression of the last few years placed upon the tariff system.

The resolutions were presented by a committee consisting of Frank D. Barton, chairman of the legislative committee of the Illinois Agricultural association; George M. Peek of the American Council of Agriculture, one of the Americans who carried on the recently published debate on farm problems with the British economist, Sir Josiah Stamp; C. W. Boyden, president of the Illinois Bankers' association; S. J. Stanard of the Illinois department of agriculture; President Walker of the Illinois Federation of Labor, and R. M. Lundstrom of the Illinois Chamber of Commerce.

The resolutions, which numbered six, were in brief as follows:

(a) Request for the abolishment of the discrimination against corn sugar in the pure food laws and widespread publicity for its use.

(b) Request for the immediate development of the Lakes-to-Gulf waterway as a means of reducing transportation costs.

(c) Declaration that the cotton and corn surplus problems are essentially the same, with an invitation to the cotton growers of the South to join the Middle West in an attempt at a solution.

(d) Attack on the present tariff, so far as its effect on farm prosperity is concerned, with a demand that the present congress inaugurates a national policy for the protection of farm products and for giving American farmers a domestic price basis as opposed to one dependent on world conditions.

(e) Request for the passage of remedial legislation in time to apply it to the present surplus.

(f) Assurance that Illinois will cooperate with Iowa in the meeting at Des Moines January 28, with commendation of the Iowa plan for a corn belt conference.

Coolidge O. K.'s Pershing Ruling on Tacna-Arica

Washington.—General Pershing's interpretation of the Tacna-Arica arbitral award was sustained by President Coolidge in his decision on the Chilean appeal from actions of the plebiscitary commission, over which the general presided.

The President reiterated that Chilean sovereignty was not involved in the interpretation of the award, and emphasized that both Chile and Peru had pledged themselves to use their resources and authority to bring about a fair plebiscite.

The general's stand that the award gave the commission "all authority necessary for the determination of the prerequisites of a fair plebiscite" was sustained by the President.

The decision was handed to the Chilean and Peruvian diplomatic representatives here and was cabled to General Pershing at Arica, where the commission is sitting.

WILL HELP HANDLE LEGION'S FINANCES

Leonard P. Ayres, whose reputation as a statistician is international and who is vice president of a Cleveland trust company, recently became a member of the National Finance committee of the American Legion. Mr. Ayres was appointed by National Commander John R. McQuigg to the position which he himself held on the finance committee prior to his election to the commandership.

Mr. Ayres organized the statistical divisions of the War department, which have become models for other governments. Mr. Ayres held the rank of colonel during the war and was the only civilian soldier ever to head a division of the general staff abroad. The statistical division of Pershing's headquarters at Chaumont, the statistical division of the service of supply and the statistical division in the War department at Washington were all organized by the new member of the Legion committee.

After the armistice, Mr. Ayres was a member of the United States peace commission, headed by the late President Woodrow Wilson, and was chief statistician and economic adviser to the commission. He held a similar position with the commission, headed by Vice President Charles G. Dawes, which helped to work out the so-called Dawes plan for reparations settlements.

Before his entry into the United States service in 1917, Mr Ayres was statistician for the allied statistical board, priorities board, war industries board and the interallied purchasing commission. For his services during the war Mr. Ayres was given the Distinguished Service medal.

Since the armistice Mr. Ayres has held the rank of a colonel in the reserves and is now statistical consultant to the War department. He wrote the War department's statistical history of the World war, a book which has been used as text by other governments in adding a statistical division to their war offices.

Prior to America's entry into the World war, Mr. Ayres pointed out, no army or military bureau had ever had a statistical department. "Wars used to be fought by armies," he said. "But the World war mobilized industrial, financial and man power resources of the nations. Naturally, statistical machinery was a vital adjunct. America was the first to appreciate this."

As a member of the National Finance committee, Mr. Ayres will assist in the safekeeping and allotment of the funds of the Legion. This committee makes out the budgets of all divisions and committees of the national organization and assists other units of the organization in financial planning.

Mr. Ayres was born in Connecticut in 1879. He holds degrees from Boston and Columbia universities.

Irrepressible Willie

To little Willie had been assigned the task of entertaining, temporarily, his mother's guest. For lack of something better to say, he asked her how she had enjoyed her vacation.

"Why, I haven't been away," she replied.

"Mom must of been mistaken, then," rejoined Willie. "I heard her tell her bridge club that you and your husband had been at Swords Points for a long time."—American Legion Weekly.

At a Profit

A doctor had just finished taking the temperature of a stock broker, who was suffering from a raging fever.

"It's gone to 102," he announced in a hushed voice, eyeing the thermometer.

The half-conscious patient raised himself on his elbow.

"Sell! Sell!" he shouted.—American Legion Weekly.

93 WORKERS KILLED IN MINE EXPLOSION

Only Ten Men Escape After Blast in Shaft Near Wilburton, Okla.

Wilburton, Okla.—All hope for any of the 93 miners entombed in the Degnan-McConnell mine near here in an explosion were abandoned.

Only ten men of the 103 in the mine when the explosion occurred have come to the surface alive.

The bodies of 87 men have been taken from the mine. Hope went up when Cecil McKinley, a young white miner, staggered from the air shaft, 23 hours after the explosion. A negro miner was found alive in the fourteenth level. A passageway was cleared through the mine and bodies of the victims were brought to the surface.

J. H. Mitchell of Wilburton, one of the rescue workers, came to the surface after working at intervals all day and told of the finding of the first bodies.

Several bodies were apparently blown to pieces, Mitchell reported. Props were blown down and the bottom of the working is covered with debris to a depth of six or seven feet.

Haywood Johnson, another rescue worker, declared the air generally good, but so cold that the workers could not remain in it long.

All other mines in the Wilburton field closed down soon after the explosion and their crews were rushed to the scene to aid in the rescue work.

Col. E. L. Head of the Oklahoma National Guard and three carloads of National Guardsmen have arrived at the scene of the disaster.

McClintock Will Admitted; Shepherd Faces Long Fight

Chicago.—The will to which young Billy McClintock scrawled his signature in April, 1924, giving most of his $1,000,000 estate to William D. Shepherd, his guardian, was admitted to probate by Circuit Judge Kickham Scanlan.

Shepherd thus has been victorious in two of the three major legal battles following the death of his ward, not long after the will was drawn. He was acquitted of the charge of murdering McClintock by administering typhoid germs. Then he lost in an attempt to probate the will before Probate Judge Henry Horner. The latest decision erases that failure.

Whichever side loses in the Chancery court hearing is sure to appeal to the Appellate court. And from there petitions may be directed to the Supreme court. It will be at least a decade before actual cash from the McClintock estate begins to trickle into the hands of the ultimate victor.

Ex-Secretary of War Baker Hits Diversion of Water

Detroit, Mich.—Chicago was roundly berated for the diversion of water from Lake Michigan by Mayor Daniel Hoan of Milwaukee and gently chided by Newton D. Baker of Cleveland, former secretary of war, at the protest meeting of the Great Lakes Harbor association.

Mr. Baker said that Chicago's diversion of water from the lake was "understandable but wrong," comparing it with the removal of rock ballast from the roadbed of a transcontinental railway to build a cobble pavement for ox carts.

The time is not far distant, he asserted, when the water power of the United States must be utilized, and then the water which Chicago is taking will be much more valuable going down the St. Lawrenne than down the Mississippi. He added that he would rather be taxed heavily than be responsible for an injustice to Canada and consequent ill feeling on her part.

Slayer of Officer Faces Firing Squad in Utah

Salt Lake City, Utah.—Ralph W. Seyboldt of Defiance, Ohio, slayer of Patrolman David Crowther, was shot to death at the state prison by a rifle squad.

Seyboldt went to his death without a tremor. Down in the prison yard a screen had been set up. Behind this screen were the riflemen, dead shots. One of the guards pinned a white paper target over Seyboldt's heart.

Streaks of fire shot from the rifles and Seyboldt fell, the target shattered by lead.

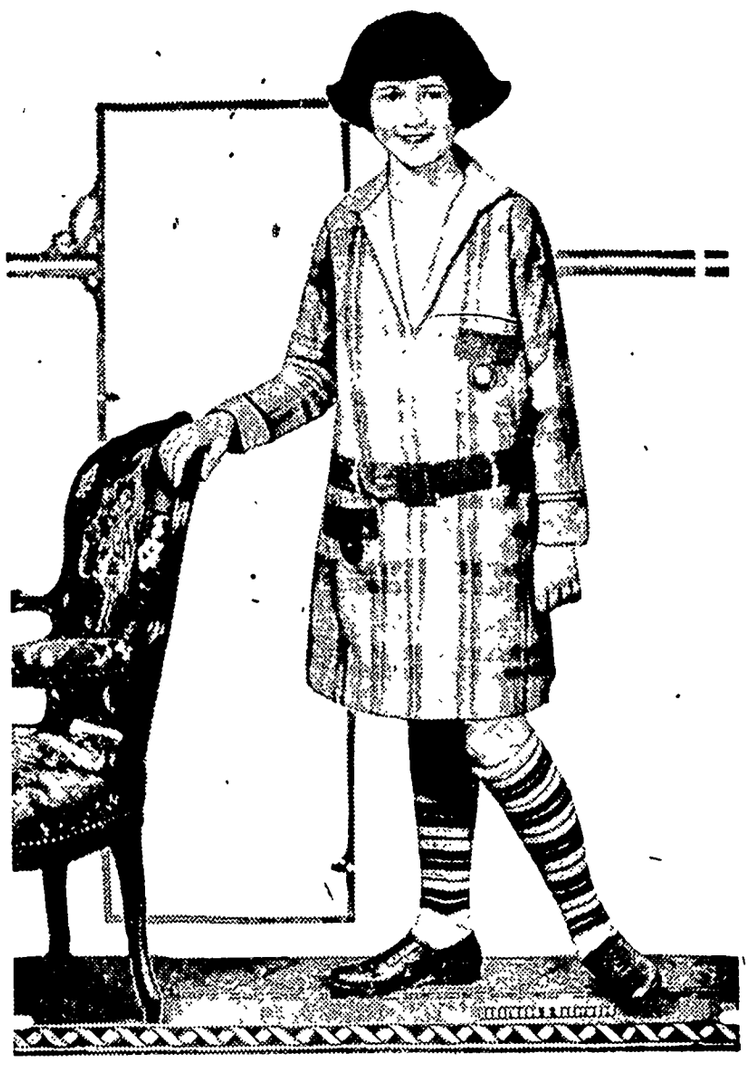
BELTS OF GAY KID ARE POPULAR; SPRING WASH GOODS NOW ON VIEW

TO MOTHERS who feel the urge of spring sewing comes the message of plaids, both lightweight woolen and gingham, for little girls' dresses—and a third fabric is added, namely plaided taffeta. Here is a further word of advice: be sure to look into the matter of gay colored leather belts, for little daughter will be sure to insist on having her pretty plaid frock belted just to keep up with the vogue.

It matters not if the dress be made in straightline one-piece effect, as the picture shows, or in jumper and skirt, be sure not to omit the leather belt, else little daughter may ask the reason why, for most of her school companions are sure to smilingly display a cunning belt of some sort this season.

Seems as if the advance displays of spring wash goods were never so alluring. Such lovely cotton reps, broadcloths and imported sateens! Washable crepes there are by the score, also cotton and rayon mixtures, the newest among which is tub-rayon alpaca. To the aspiring home dressmaker they surely must whisper in unmistakable accents, "Do it now." And why not? Later the great outdoors will be calling to golf, tennis and springtime strolls.

The frock in the picture is a true exponent of a sweet simplicity frock, such as can so successfully be made at home. In choosing materials for home dressmaking let thoughts of pastel colorings guide you. Pastel blendings will especially find expression, in such ways, for instance, as bordering or piping a lively tone with another complementary shade. For the pretty dress here illustrated old rose cotton broadcloth is suggested, using buttons of lavender tinted pearl, matching it with wee velvet ribbon.



Plaid Frock for Spring.

Fine woolen plaid was the chosen medium for the fashionable frock here pictured. This same model could be effectively reproduced in French gingham. That is such a pretty idea of using a solid color for the revers, the vestee, cuffs and pocket finishings.

This model could be exquisitely copied in plaid taffeta and at this time of the year remnants are picked up at enticing reductions.

The little highland lassie in the picture is thrice blest, in that her frock is plaid, boasts a sure-enough leather belt with a big square buckle, and crowning joy of all, the socks are striped in accord with fashion's latest edict.

For school wear later on plaid gingham jumper frocks will be quite the thing. These are so easily made at home, and the ginghams now on display are so very attractive. Why not make two blouses to the one plaited skirt? Sleeves and collars soil so easily and economy suggests several waists as a simple solving of the problem.

Stripes are also greatly featured this season. One can buy nowadays such clever striped sateen or cotton broadcloth. The striped blouse with skirt in solid color bespeaks a favored mode.

Pretty pastel harmonies are accomplished by using wide borderings of a different shade. There is also every indication that we are also to enjoy a season of bordered patterns. Initial showings of spring cottons stress fascinating 54-inch bordered voiles. There is economy in the use of these wide materials, and patterns are available which call for the manipulation of the fabric without underarm seams.

Cottons for the Southland include

A Sweet Simplicity Frock.

rayon mixed crepes with borders blocked in tapestry effect carried out in light and deeper pastel tones. Hand-blocked linen showing colorful Chinese patterning is among the season's novelties.

It is said that considerable lace will be used on simple daytime wash dresses. The ochre tinted lace is most popular. Girlish collars and deep cuffs, together with jabots of ochre lace, are rendered even a greater attractiveness by the addition of tiny ribbon bows and ties.

THE KITCHEN CABINET

All human achievement comes about through bodily activity. All bodily activity is caused, controlled and directed by the mind. —Warren Hilton, A.B.

TASTY SANDWICHES

For various occasions the sandwich may make a sufficiently satisfying dish, with a hot drink, for a light meal.

Halibut Sandwiches. — Finely chop one pound of cold cooked halibut; season with a few drops of onion juice, two teaspoonfuls of lemon juice, salt and cayenne; fold in one-fourth cupful of heavy cream that has been beaten stiff, add the whites of three eggs, also beaten stiff. Turn the mixture into a small buttered mold and cook in a moderate oven until firm. Chill and cut into thin slices; use as filling with mayonnaise or cooked salad dressing.

Watercress Sandwiches.—Wash and dry fresh watercress. Finely chop the whites of two hard-cooked eggs and press the yolks through a ricer. Mix the yolks, whites and watercress; season with salt pepper and moisten with mayonnaise. Spread thin slices of white bread with mayonnaise and an equal number with the watercress mixture. Put together in pairs, trim off the crusts and cut into strips or triangles.

Swiss Cheese Sandwiches.—Spread thin slices of rye bread sparingly with mustard. Cover the mustard with thin slices of Swiss cheese. Spread an equal number of slices with mayonnaise, cover with very thin slices of Spanish onion, spread the onion lightly with salad dressing and put together in pairs.

Hot Ham and Tomato Sandwiches.—Fry very thin slices of lean ham very quickly in a hot pan. Peel and slice tomatoes very thin. Have ready slices of toasted bread, spread the toast with salad dressing, cover with ham, then a slice of tomato; add dressing and chopped lettuce leaves. Cover with toast spread on the under side with dressing. Serve cut into triangles with hot coffee.

Melba Sandwiches. — Finely chop the meat from three dozen large olives. Add one cupful of finely chopped pecan meats. Moisten with mayonnaise dressing. Spread thin slices of graham bread with green pepper butter and an equal number with the olive mixture; put together in pairs and cut into triangles.

Sliced Chicken Sandwiches. — Cut cold cooked chicken into very thin slices. Lay them on bread spread with green pepper butter, arrange in pairs and garnish with slices of stuffed olives.

Good Things We Like.

Take a firm head of cabbage, cut it into halves and remove the hard heart, let stand in very cold water to crisp for an hour or two, then shred with a sharp knife or with a shredder. Sprinkle with salt and a little sugar, add enough vinegar to moisten, then cover with thick sweet cream. Serve as a salad

Butterscotch Pie.—Take two tablespoonfuls of butter, three of brown sugar, and melt in a smooth omelet pan. Mix two eggs with one-half cupful of brown sugar, a tablespoonful of cornstarch, two tablespoonfuls of flour and one cupful of milk. Cook until thick, add vanilla to flavor, and turn in the butter and sugar. When all are dissolved and smooth pour into a baked shell and serve, hot or cold.

Date Layer Cake.—Stone a cupful of dates, cover with a teaspoonful of soda and cover with a cupful of boiling water. To one cupful of sugar add two tablespoonfuls of butter, an egg well beaten, a teaspoonful of vanilla and one and two-thirds cupfuls of flour, with a teaspoonful of baking powder and one-half cupful of walnuts. Mix all together and combine the ingredients, and bake fifteen or twenty minutes. Filling for the cake—one-half cupful each of sour cream, brown sugar and vanilla to flavor.

Fudge.—Take one cupful each of entire wheat flour and cold water. Beat with a Dover egg beater, adding a little salt. Bake in popover pans.

Peppermints.—Melt fondant over hot water, add peppermint to flavor, drop by spoonfuls on buttered sheet or paraffin paper. They may be made by adding one-half cupful of boiling water to one and one-half cupfuls of sugar; boil ten minutes after stirring until the sugar is well dissolved, remove from the fire, add six drops of oil of peppermint and beat until thick enough to drop.

Pineapple Pie.—Take one can of grated pineapple, one cupful of sugar, the yolks of two eggs well beaten, two teaspoonfuls of cornstarch combined with the egg yolks, one tablespoonful of melted butter. Bake in a pastry-lined pie plate and cover with a meringue, using the egg whites beaten stiff with two tablespoonfuls of sugar.

Rice Jack.—Cook together one cupful each of sugar and molasses and two tablespoonfuls of water; when brittle add a tablespoonful of butter, a pinch of soda and stir in three cupfuls of puffed rice. Spread in a buttered pan to cool.

Notice Given

An epileptic dropped in a fit on the streets of Mason City not long ago, and was taken to a hospital. Upon removing his coat there was found pinned to his vest a slip of paper on which was written:

"This is to inform the head-surgeon that this is just a case of plain fit; not appendicitis. My appendix has already been removed twice."

Just Indifferent

Negro Sam sought to sell to Negro Mose an old mule. The animal was found lying down in the stall with its eyes closed. After some effort the mule was forced to get up. Then Mose insisted he be shown the live stock in action. Sam chased the mule into the yard. In a few minutes the animal crashed head first into a tree. Then he backed off, turned, and hit another tree.

"Say," said Mose, "that 'er mule is blind. I don't want 'im."

"Listen here, man, that mule ain't blind," responded the owner, "he just don't give a dam."

A Clear Case

A swagger ,well-dressed man marched up to a ticket office in a station and, to the surprise of the clerk, asked for a "seaman's return."

"We only issue them to seamen," the clerk pointed out, politely.

The applicant looked at him in anger.

"Why, you leather-necked, swivel-eyed son of a sea cook, if you feel my starboard boom running foul of your headlights, you'll haul in your jaw tackle a bit, and then—"

"Give him a ticket, quick" shrieked an inspector standing near. "He's one, right enough."

Those days in Jerry's lovely home with Jerry's father, Duane felt were the happiest of his entire life. They had breakfast together in the morning, reading the papers over their coffee, drove to the factory together, and went out for luncheon to a cafe or club somewhere. And in the evening they played pinochle, smoked and read, sometimes just smoked and talked. They went to the Princess to patronize the stock company which will go down in history as the start-in-life of Fay Bainter. Once Jerrold had some men in, and they played poker.

Sometimes Duane forgot that Jerrold was to be his father-in-law, thought of him only as a remarkably companionable old chap, and easy to have around.

"You know, Mr. Harmer," he said one night, "since I've been so—so keen on Jerry—and so d—n mad at her stubbornness—I've sort of lost interest in—you know—women and things. That's not natural. Does it hang over—or do you get back when you've been married a while?"

"You act like a blase old roue," said Jerrold, "but you talk like a kid." And then he said with a great assumption of sternness, "See here, young fellow, I'm on Jerry's side. Don't you try to get anything out of me that you may be able to use against me later on. You stick to the straight and narrow." He laughed a little. "I won't say that in all my twenty years I haven't felt the fleeting intrigue of a foreign dimple or curl, or maybe an ankle—and there's no denying that a woman does get on your nerves, especially the way she lugs your tobacco out of your reach—but I'm strong for Prudence. But of course, there aren't many Prudences. You wouldn't expect that."

One night he asked about that picture in Jerry's room, the Ocean Rider.

"It's a haunting thing," he said. "It makes you think of Jerry somehow—"

"Oh, didn't you know Theresa? The picture gave me the creeps, too, at first. The eyes are Jerry's. She has nice eyes; maybe you've noticed it," he added slyly. "Not as nice now, I think, as when she left. She looks more—cloudy. But very nice. The picture is a shock at first sight. Makes you feel as if you've caught her stepping out of the bath."

He told Duane then of Theresa and her tragic death, her even more tragic life. Duane was shocked, hurt. It seemed a terrible thing for Jerry to go through, and lacking the support of his tenderness and sympathy. He hated himself, as though he had failed her when she had need of him.

Once he said, "Why do you suppose she wouldn't flirt with me—when she did with others? And I know she—liked me well enough."

Jerrold said, "I don't know, what do you think?" And did not realize he had caught that cleverness of evasion from his wife.

"Did she tell you I was drunk that night?" Duane persisted morbidly.

"Jerry never tells us things until she needs us," said Jerrold proudly. "She struggles along by herself, until she knows she is whipped. Then she comes to Prudence and me. She was like that when she was a baby. She would work for half a day trying to fix a broken toy by herself—a thing I could do in a minute—but she never came until she had worn herself out working at it alone and found it too much for her. Prudence likes that; she thinks it shows character."

After a blissful week that was full of reminiscences of Prudence and Jerry in the past and countless hopes for Prudence and Jerry in the future, the telegram came to announce their returning, and Jerrold said regretfully:

"Sorry, old fellow, I've got to chuck you out. The girls will be home this evening."

Duane's disappointment and his regret at leaving were almost childish. In the intimacy of Jerry's home he had almost forgotten their estrangement and felt she should be coming to him as Prudence came back to Jerrold.

"I wonder what would happen if I just stuck on and faced the music," he said to Jerrold, "as if I had a right to be here."

"Oh, good lord," was all Jerry's father had to say.

So Duane packed his bags bitterly, unhappily, and moved back to the sordid stupidity of his hotel room.

Jerrold spent the rest of the day going through the house, removing every trace of evidence as to the presence of a guest. He cautioned the maids, over and over, to breathe not a word of what had transpired, and in the evening met his wife and daughter at the station.

In deference to the returning of Prudence, he generously removed the bronze smoking stand from the side of the bed and put it back in the stairway lounge where she had left it. He always made that concession on the night that Prudence returned. And Prudence in gratitude for his generosity, always carried it back when they went to bed, and put it where his hand could not fail to find it the moment he should awaken.

He kissed Prudence first, kissed her twice. Then he turned to Jerry. Jerry always surprised him. She took hold of both of his arms, and looked deep, deep into his eyes, her own unsmiling, pleading, anxious. Jerrold met them bravely, although his heart sank guiltily beneath the weight on his conscience. He wondered if he bore a mark engraved upon his features that her lynx-bright eyes could read and understand.

But Jerry said nothing. She released her tense grip upon his arms after a moment, and kissed him.

CHAPTER VIII

Between Friends

During the dinner hour on an early evening in November Jerry was called to the telephone, and when she came back a moment later to her place there was a curious, quizzical smile upon her lips and in her eyes.

"It was Adela Longley," she explained. "She wanted me to go to the theater with her."

"Adela Longley!" Prudence was gently surprised.

"Are you going?" asked Jerrold, with his usual lack of inter-penetration.

"It was Adela Longley," Jerry repeated, for his enlightenment. "Of course I am not going. I told her I am very busy tonight."

Jerry and her mother exchanged glances of smiling tolerance—tolerance for Jerrold's mannish incomprehension of delicate social situations, smiling because they loved him. For from New York down, the veriest hamlet has its central select set which seems a thing of merest idle chance, and yet the laws of the Medes and Persians themselves were not a whit more binding.

Adela Longley was one who hovered as it were in the remote whorls of that society which circled about Jerry as a point of pivot. She belonged to the large social life of Des Moines, but was not, and could not be, a part of that inner nucleus which is so rigidly a thing apart. And yet Jerry was the very soul of democracy; she said she abhorred snobbishness of all things in the world; she made no slightest distinction as to place or person—only as to personality. She didn't care for Adela Longley. "Oh, she's a different sort, very nice of course—I don't care about her." It was Adela, Jerry felt, who kept Adela in the social fringe.

"Maybe she thinks if she gets a little clubby with you I may give her a better price on a car," suggested Jerrold, always glad to help out with his opinion.

Jerry was interested. "A car! Another car? Why, she has a car now!"

"She's tired of it. She wants to trade it in on a Harmer. She has been in three times this week to see about it."

Jerry lowered the misty lashes reflectively. Only Jerry knew how very strange a thing that was. She was not above sounding her father for confirmation of her suspicion.

"She has a Harkness! It cost nearly five thousand dollars more than mine."

"Yes, she said she would have nothing but a Harkness in the beginning, but she doesn't like it now she has it. She wants to trade it in for a Harmer roadster like yours."

"Like mine! But you had mine made specially for me, and I designed—"

"Yes, I know. Duane told her—"

"Who told her?"

"Oh—Mr. Allerton, you know, Duane Allerton. He is on the floor, you see. He showed her the models, and she's been talking to him about it."

"Oh, I see." Jerry had her confirmation. "Well, go on. What did—he—tell her?"

"He said we will not duplicate the body of your car for anybody, but that we will design another special for her, any style she likes. But we do not care to duplicate yours under any circumstances."

"Adela Longley made fun of the Harmer when she got hers," said Jerry reflectively. "She said she wanted a good car or none at all. The girls used to tease me about it."

"Well, maybe she thinks more of it now. Duane says she was enthusiastic about the demonstration."

"Who gave her the demonstration?"

"He did."

"I should think," Jerry's voice was so soft as to be almost inaudible, "I should think the salesmen would do that."

"They do ordinarily. But she had talked to him on the floor several times, and asked him particularly to take her out. So of course he did."

Jerry had lost her appetite for dinner. Her thoughts were running along a new line.

"Myrtle Ingersoll and I went to a matinee Wednesday," she said slowly. "She wanted to come by the office and ask you to go with us."

"Ask who?"

"You, father. She thinks you are such a dear. I told her you are a perfect slave to business and never go out in the afternoon, and she wanted to come by and ask you anyhow, thought you might be pleased with the attention. I didn't think anything of it then. But I'm thinking plenty now."

Jerrold laughed easily. "Oh, they think up sillier excuses than that to get a look at him. Not that I blame them at all! There aren't enough good-looking young fellows to go the rounds here, you know."

It had not before occurred to Jerry to wonder what Duane was doing during the evening, with whom he was going out, what friendships he was forming. Now that this phase of the situation was so forcibly drawn to her attention, she realized very clearly that in a town the size of Des Moines, a young man of good appearance, who could dance, play bridge, and with great personal charm to his credit, was not at all likely to pass by unobserved.

And if further corroboration were necessary, she received it in painful plenitude on Monday evening at Grace McCartney's shower for Rae Forsythe, when all the girls of their particular clique were together. Jerry was late in arriving, and was greeted at once with a gay protesting outburst.

"Oh, Jerry, how could you be so selfish!"

"Jerry Harmer, you ought to be ashamed of yourself! Anything as good-looking as that!"

"Where in the world did your father find it?"

Jerry realized it would be foolish to pretend ignorance as to their meaning, in a town as small and as fraternal as Des Moines. She laughed it off as best she could, explained gayly that she left the management of the Harmer Motor to her father, and agreed that Duane Allerton was certainly a very handsome thing.

"Do you know him, Jerry?" asked Edith Weatherby.

"Yes, I met him in New York."

This was greeted with merry, significant exclamations and laughter.

"Oh, so it's like that!" they cried.

"No wonder!"

"It seems he had some sort of financial reverses," she went on quickly.

Jerrold Carefully Placed the Great Cloak About His Daughter's Shoulders.

"I don't know much about it, but he wanted to make a change, and you know father is always taking on men."

"Do you like him, Jerry?" persisted Edith Weatherby.

Jerry was not to be caught unguarded. "Of course. Why not? I hardly know the man."

"And you're not personally interested, are you?" continued her interrogator. "Because he told me he had lost a lot of money, and I told father—father likes him very much—and I told father I was sure he would rather work in a bank than in a factory. You know my father is always taking on men, too."

Jerry's eyes were serene and unclouded. "Yes, of course. That would be lovely for Mr. Allerton. I am sure his opportunity would be much greater in the bank than with my father."

More than ever Jerry regretted that hasty impulse of hers which had brought Duane Allerton to Iowa. And yet she took a bitter, morbid satisfaction in having them know that after all she had known him first, that she had been in a sense the motive of his coming—as, indeed, she had, and in a far more intimate sense than Jerry would have them suspect.

On the evening of Thanksgiving occurred the annual dinner-dance at the club, one of the real events of the year to which the younger set at least looked forward for weeks with keen anticipation. Usually Jerry made one of a group of her particular friends, while Prudence and Jerrold filled up a table with couples of their own age and interests. But, for this night, Jerry persistently refused all invitations, and insisted on a family trio, Prudence, Jerrold and herself. To her friends she said she thought her mother would like it. To Prudence she said honestly:

"Oh, mother, I'm tired! I don't feel like pretending to be interested in a lot of things—when I am not."

On the afternoon of the dance she sat curled in a big chair before the fire with a magazine she did not read, and Jerrold sat opposite her with the evening paper, smoking, and neither of them answered when Prudence reminded them for the third time that they must hurry and dress. Finally, at her insistence, Jerrold dropped the paper and sighed.

"I'm getting too old for such goings-on," he said plaintively. "I feel just like sitting here in my own house by my own fire, and going to bed at a respectable hour."

"Too late," Prudence told him, laughing. "You have to go or you get no dinner. Mary and Katie have gone out, and there is nothing to eat. You must go with us or fast."

Jerrold sighed again. Then he turned to Jerry, with the news that had been a burden to him for two days.

"Oh! Jerry—by the way—Duane will be there."

Jerry did not move, did not turn her eyes. "Oh, will he?"

"Yes. The Weatherbys asked him to go, and I told him to go by all means. I don't feel that he should miss a good time just because you feel a little—er—sensitive about his presence, do you? It's a wonder you haven't run into him before this. They're inviting him everywhere. And besides—"

"Oh, don't hesitate on my account. Go right ahead. Besides what?"

"Besides, as I've said before, there are more nice girls in this town than there are nice boys. Other men have daughters as well as I, and daughters requiring beauing. And I must say that some fathers seem to have daughters with a greater degree of that sweet reasonableness they talk about than my own."

Jerry smiled sympathetically. "Poor father!" she said. "You did have rather bad luck getting only me. But however much you may prefer other fathers' daughters to your own, you can't get rid of me. No trading daughters. Things aren't done that way. You must keep what you get, whether you like it or not."

She touched him lightly on the shoulder as she passed by and went quickly up the stairs.

Jerrold looked at Prudence.

"Is she going?" he asked in a loud whisper.

"I don't know."

They tiptoed together to the doorway and listened. There was no sound from Jerry's room above.

They tiptoed back. "Now if she has any notion of going there and snubbing him in public I won't stand for it," Jerrold said, still whispering. "After all, she brought him here, and she shan't—"

"Oh, don't you worry about that. She wants to make him eat the dust before her, but she'll never give anybody else a chance to laugh at him. You'll see!" And then she added, half hopefully, half wistfully, "Perhaps they will make it all up tonight, and then we'll have him here for Thanksgiving dinner tomorrow!"

CHAPTER IX

A Little for Remembrance

At a quarter to seven Prudence tapped lightly on Jerry's door.

"I'll be right down." Jerry's voice from behind the closed door was very low, a little strained. She did not ask her mother to come in, and Prudence made no such offer, but went directly down and stood silently, anxiously beside her husband in the lower hall and awaited the coming of her daughter.

Jerry wore the flame-colored gown of chiffon velvet, and as she stood above them on the steps, smiling down at them, involuntarily they exclaimed at the fresh, bright revelation of her beauty.

"Of course a daughter studying Art in New York will wear what she pleases—in New York," said Jerrold, frowning with a great assumption of disapproval, although his eyes shone with his pride and pleasure in her loveliness. "But if you ask me—though nobody did—I call that dress a little—well, snappy for the old home town."

"It is beautiful," said Prudence. "I thought you did not like it, Jerry. You haven't worn it once since you came home."

Jerrold carefully placed the great cloak about his daughter's shoulders.

"You have too much rouge on," he objected.

"I know it" she assented. "But I am a shocking color tonight in the natural. So pale I am positively yellow. Do you think perhaps I may be getting thin-blooded, mother? I never used to look so white."

"Perhaps you need a tonic," Prudence suggested, though she knew in her heart that Jerry needed no such thing.

Life and Death

A man with an uncanny mania for juggling with figures produced pencil and paper and said to a friend: "Put down the number of your living brothers. Multiply it by two. Add three. Multiply the result by five. Add the number of living sisters. Multiply the result by ten. Add the number of dead brothers and sisters. Subtract 150 from the result." The friend did it. "Now," said the other with a cunning smile, "the right-hand figure will be the number of deaths, the middle figure the number of living sisters, and the left-hand figure the number of living brothers." And so it was.—Tit-Bits.

Show Definite Value of Municipal Forests

The government is still by far the largest interest committed to true conservation, and the national forests are the largest areas under this type of management. The obvious reasons for this condition are the paramount public interest, the enduring character of the government, its freedom from taxation, and like advantages. What the national and state governments have done in this field is too familiar for repetition here, but there is a new governmental development in forestry that is worthy of notice. This is the movement for town forests, French Strother observes, in the World's Work.

This movement was inspired by observation of European experience. In Sweden, France and Germany many towns and cities own their own municipal woodlands, and operate them as a regular function of local government. So profitable are some of these town forests that they relieve the citizens of all local taxes. No such results could be hoped for in this country, but the advantages are so numerous that several states have enacted laws to encourage towns to acquire municipal forests. Such woodlands provide employment for labor, raw material for local needs (even material for small local mills, at a price that saves the consumer the freight), and a near-by recreation ground of great social value. In some places, the town forest is an invaluable protective cover for the local water supply.

Industrial Experts Will Advise Towns

An approved list of industrial experts to advise cities and towns on ways and means of obtaining the type of industries suitable to their location has been started by the National Association of Real Estate Boards at the suggestion of the industrial property division of that body.

A large proportion of the 557 member boards of the national association throughout the United States and Canada are co-operating with cities in locating new industries. The Knoxville (Tenn.) chamber of commerce has asked the local board for its aid in a campaign for factories. The San Francisco real estate board and the chamber of commerce are making joint effort to aid manufacturers in securing the best possible sites by making complete listings of all industrial properties.

Consolidated Schools

Comparing costs and results of education in consolidated and in one-teacher schools in Connecticut shows that 29 per cent of pupils fourteen years of age in one-room schools drop out during the school year, but only 8 per cent in consolidated schools drop out; 41 per cent of those fifteen years of age in one-room schools drop out as compared with 12 per cent in consolidated schools. The percentage of elimination in the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth grades of one-teacher schools is approximately twice as great as in the same grades in consolidated schools. Of the teachers in one-teacher schools, 23 per cent have had two years or more of professional training, compared with 49 per cent in consolidated schools; and teachers in consolidated schools have on the average two years more experience than those in one-teacher schools.—School Life.

Lien Law Simplification

Widespread approval is being expressed of the announcement by Secretary Hoover that he has appointed a committee to work on simplification and unification of the many and varying lien laws which now confuse the construction industry. In order to frame a model act which will be as fair as possible to all different groups, it was felt that these groups should be represented in deciding on the general principles to be embodied in the act and that the best legal advice should be obtained in connection with phrasing it.

Town Should Advertise

Once a town has reason to be proud of itself it should post its location. No traveler who comes within 15 miles of a town that has any enterprise should need to ask direction or the distance to the place; every turn of the roads should give the desired information. When a town has so little enterprise as to conceal its whereabouts from the passerby it usually is not worth discovering.

Street Lighting

Street lighting costs are low. Statistics show that for every dollar of city tax, street lighting tax may run from 28 cents to 48 cents. For a really good lighting, the annual expenditure should be $1 per capita per year, according to experts. Only nine states spent more than 90 cents and of these only four spent more than $1.

Use of Stone

One means of adding permanence and a sense of strength to the better home is the use of stone. No material lends itself so easily to more dignified treatment or has the lasting qualities which can go down through the ages if necessary.

WILLIE BETRAYS MA

The family was at supper when the vicar called. Hurriedly the mother put the beer bottles under the table.

"Good evening. Rather a cool evening," she said.

"Yes," replied the vicar; "no doubt we shall get some more hail."

"I don't think you will," chirped little Willie. "Mother's just hid it under the table."—London Tit-Bits.

INSIST UPON KEMP'S BALSAM for that COUGH!

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 83

"Purges" and "Physics" Bad for Old Folks

While Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, knew that constipation was the curse of advancing age, he did not believe that a "purge" or "physic" every little while was necessary.

To him, it seemed cruel that so many constipated old people had to be kept constantly "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin he discovered a laxative which helps to "regulate" the bowels of old folks. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin not only causes a gentle, easy bowel movement but each dose helps to strengthen the bowel muscles, shortly establishing natural "regularity." It never gripes, sickens, or upsets the system. Besides, it is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take.

If past fifty, buy a large 60-cent bottle at any store that sells medicine and just see for yourself.

Dr. Caldwell's SYRUP PEPSIN

This woman's experience is typical of thousands. Ask any physician.

"And to think I was poisoning my own Baby!"

"I couldn't see why he didn't gain. I never dreamed that my constipation was responsible until the doctor told me.

"He explained that faulty or slow elimination of waste matter allowed poisons to form and be absorbed by the blood—and this meant tainted milk for baby.

"He prescribed the Nujol treatment and it made a world of difference to both of us. Now that I know how dangerous constipation is and how easily it can be prevented, I am never going to allow myself to get into that bad condition again."

Mothers are the best friends of Nujol. When precious new lives are at stake they seek the remedy that medical authorities approve because it is so safe, gentle and natural in its action. Constipation is dangerous for anybody. Nujol is safe for everybody. It does not affect the stomach and is not absorbed by the body.

Nujol helps in Nature's own way

Nujol simply makes up for a deficiency—temporary or chronic—in the supply of natural lubricant in the intestines. It softens the waste matter and thus permits thorough and regular elimination, without overtaxing the intestinal muscles.

Nujol can be taken for any length of time without ill effects. To insure internal cleanliness, it should be taken regularly in accordance with the directions on each bottle. Unlike laxatives, it does not form a habit and can be discontinued at any time.

Nujol THE INTERNAL LUBRICANT For Constipation

Ask your druggist for Nujol today and begin to enjoy the perfect health that is possible only when elimination is normal and regular.

KLEMME CAGERS WIN DECISIVE VICTORY OVER HAYFIELD

KLEMME BOYS BEAT HAYFIELD IN HARD FOUGHT GAME

Thursday Night's Game Was Fastest Game Of The Season

The Klemme high school boys cage team put a feather in their cap last Thursday night, when they defeated Hayfield by a large score. Hayfield is generally believed to be the strongest team in Hancock County and have defeated some of the strongest high school teams in the county. By beating Hayfield Thursday night puts the Klemme High School basket ball team to the top of the list of strong teams in the county.

There were hrills galore in this game and both teams fought like tigers, tying the score 3 to 3 at the end of the first quarter. At the half the game was still tied 9 to 9. Coach Hockey must have put up a strong line of talk to his boys for they came back like a cyclone in the second half and fairly rushed Hayfield off their feet. The locals began some real swift playing and began counting up ringers and at the close of the third quarter had a lead of 8 points over Hayfield and the score then read, Klemme 19; Hayfield 11.

To cinch the deal Hockey's cagers kept up their fast pace and when the game ended Klemme won by a large score of 25 to 14.

The Klemme girls did not fair so well as they lost to the smaller, but faster Hayfield girls 30 to 21. It will be remembered that the Klemme-Hayfield girls played a 25-25 game recently at Hayfield, and which time the Klemme boys got the small end of he score.

Lost But Two Games

The Klemme cagers have a mighty fine record this year, having lost but two games all season. One game was lost to Hayfield, and which they have redeemed themselves on gloriously. The other game was lost to Ventura recently.

In both of these games which they lost the boys played in hard luck; they couldn't seem to get going right and the "breaks" of the game were always against them. However, the locals are going to beat Ventura and clean the slate. Ventura recently fell an easy victim to Hayfield and as Klemme trimmed Hayfield in good shape, they should have no trouble in winning over Ventura.

PENITENTIARY WARDEN AT FORT MADISON GIVES SOME VIEWS ON CRIME IN IOWA

Urges Ban On Guns and Sterilization Of Criminals

Fort Madison, Ia., Jan. 28—"When the American people become as hard boiled with the criminal as the criminal is with the public, there will be less crime in America," is the belief of T. P. Hallowell, warden of the Iowa State Penitentiary.

In a statement to the Associated Press, Warden Hallowell asserted America offers not only liberty to the foreign and domestic crook but conditions favorable to crime.

"Slow court action, use of stolen money to employ expert criminal lawyers, and the right to bear arms against law abiding citizens," says the warden, "are some of the factors that have made America the happy hunting ground for criminals of all classes."

Delays in apprehension of criminals when the public wrath concerning their depredations has waned, is in favor of the law breakers, Mr. Hallowell points out. He calls attention to the recent shooting episode at Dows when a gang of bandits took possession of the town.

"These men will be apprehended some time, probably after they have pulled similar jobs," said Warden Hallowell. When they are, they will have plenty of stolen money to employ legal talent who will demand a fair and just trial. They will be given that with all the customary delays that money can buy. The public will have forgotten the Dows crime, which will make it difficult for the prosecution to obtain a jury which will give these gunmen the penalty the deserve."

As a remedy, Mr. Hallowell proposes several reforms in the handling of criminals.

He would prohibit the manufacture and sale of small arms and ammunition except to fill the needs of peace officers.

"Seventy-one per cent of the murders in this country in 1920 were committed with revolvers, pistols and automatics. In that year there were 5,815 murders as compared with 241 in England where they are not permitted."

Other suggestions made by Mr. Hallowell are as follows:

"Collect all the small arms in the state and government arsenals to be held for use in the next war.

"Sterilize habitual criminals and state dependents to prevent them bringing into the world children who from birth would be woefully handicapped by a small conception of the difference between right and wrong.

"Place responsibility for law enforcement in each county in either the sheriff or chief of police of one of the cities. Often the lack of cooperation between the police and the sheriff proves detrimental to the best interests of the public.

"Place criminal lawyers who accept as fees stolen money in the same class with the men they defend and punish them.

"Simplify court action to protect the innocent and prevent the guilty from escaping upon technicalities. People are either innocent or guilty and the dotting of an 'i' or crossing of a 't' should have no bearing on the outcome of the case.

"Elect and keep in office only men who have sufficient courage and honesty to perform unpleasant duties without flinching and unaffected by sentiment."

Warden Hallowell would pay those in public office who met these requirements one-tenth of the amount taken annually from the public by the criminal element.

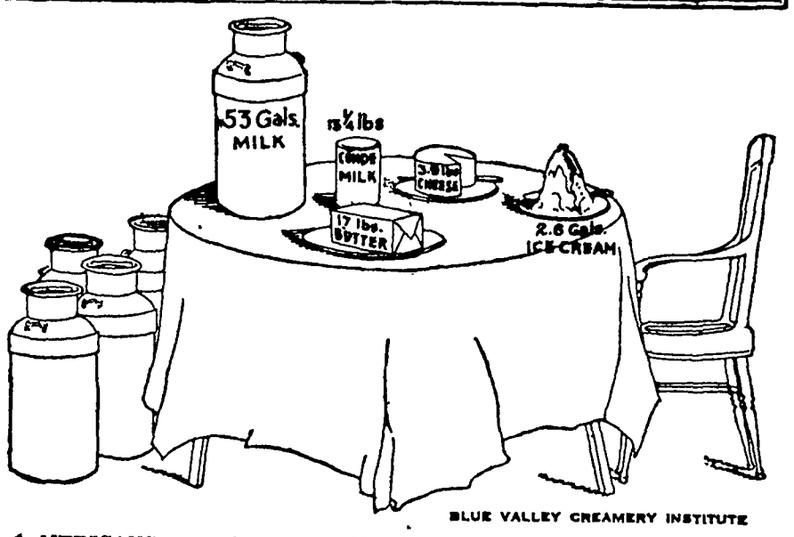
Americans Consume Four Times Their Weight in Dairy Products



BLUE VALLEY CREAMERY INSTITUTE

AMERICANS annually consume 53 gallons of milk, 17 pounds of butter, 13¼ pounds of condensed and evaporated milk, 3.9 pounds of cheese and 2.6 gallons of ice cream, or a total of dairy products equal to four times their body weight. This means that American families eat approximately one ton of dairy products in a year, according to the Blue Valley Creamery Institute.

Dairy products make up a still larger proportion of the diet of people in many other countries. In Sweden, Denmark, Switzerland and Germany whole milk consumption is from 50 to 70 per cent higher than in the United States, the Institute survey shows. England's colonies—Canada, Australia and New Zealand—consume 12 to 60 per cent more butter than America. The United States is not nearly as large a consumer of cheese as many of the other nations, but the nutritive value of dairy products is becoming more widely appreciated in the United States, with the result that the per capita consumption is increasing Silver Wedding Anniversary Celebrated At Garner Sat.

GREIMANN AND GOLD FAMILIES HAVE BIG GATHERING

They Help Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Greimann Celebrate Silver Wedding

Mr and Mrs George H. Greimann, of Garner, were married January 23, 1901, and last Saturday being their Silver Wedding Anniversary, was duly celebrated. Only the immediate families of Mr. and Mrs. Greimann were present, but that means over one hundred people, and even then they could not all be present. George is from a family of fourteen children and all were present but two. Mrs. Greimann is from a family of thirteen children and they were all present.

Those present from George's side of the family were his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Greimann, Sr., Geo. and his wife and two children, their other four children being in Florida; W. H. and wife and eight children, Mrs. Chas. Goll, husband and eight children, Mrs. Wes Lenz, husband and five children, F. H. wife and three children, Mrs. Chas. Griffin, husband and six children, H. A. wife and three children, Ed, wife and one child, Ben V. and wife, Oscar and wife and one child, Addis and wife, and Clarence who lives with his parents. Mrs. F. L. Weaver and husband and five children were unable to be present because of sickness, and Rev. H. Greimann and five children were unable to come from Schaller, Iowa.

The Greimann side of the house consists of Fred Greimann, Sr., and wife, 14 children, 51 grandchildren and three great grandchildren. The three great grandchildren are the children of Mr. and Mrs. Earl Stille and Edwin Greimann's child. Mr. and Mrs. Earl Stille and children, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Greimann and child, Howard and Marvin Greimann are in Florida at work, and were unable to be here.

On Mrs. Greimann's side of the family there is nearly a life number. While there are not quite so many on this side of the family they were all present Saturday. Mrs. Greimann's mother, Mrs. John Goll, heads this list, and the children and their families are as follows, Gotlieb Goll, wife and four children, Mrs. W. J. Barz, husband and one child, Chas. Goll, wife and eight children, (the Chas. Goll family is also listed in the Greimann family) Will Haberkamp, wife and six children, George and Jake Goll who are single, Mrs. Art Haes, husband and two children, Mrs. Art Upmeyer, husband and three children, Mrs. Chas. Haes, husband and two children, Mrs. Ralph Quintus, husband and two children, Ben Goll, wife and one child.

In the Goll family are thirteen children, thirty-eight grandchildren and three great grandchildren. George Greimann and wife live in Garner, and all the rest live in or near Garner and around Klemme on farms between the two places, except Rev. H. Greimann, who is pastor of a church at Schaller, Iowa. George Greimann's daughter and sons are temporarily in Florida.

The Greimann children who are in Florida wired their parents a nice present in the way of a big roll of silver dollars, and the relatives present gave a like present. A bonteous feast was served Saturday evening, and a glorious time was had. Two such remarkable families as the Greimann and Goll families are seldom found, either in numbers or as honest, substantial people. Mr. and Mrs. Fred Greimann and Mrs. John Goll may well be proud of their offspring.

On Friday evening about fifty of the neighbors gave Mr. and Mrs. Greimann a surprise and presented them with a fine set of silver knives forks and spoons.

DOINGS OF THE WEEK REPORTED BY THE LOCAL SCHOOL

KLEMME BASKET BALL BOYS ARE GOING STRONG

Klemme Wins Both Games With Renwick

The basket ball games with Renwick on Tuesday night of this week were not as close and interesting as we had anticipated. We had anticipated a battle roya' but the boys from Renwick were plainly outclassed in both frays.

With an airtight defense set up by Tanner and Turgeson and the scoring end working well, our boys were never in danger. Donald Gibbs, in his brother's place who was temporarily out of the game, played a good game but was plainly not so familiar with the formations as Frank.

Gimer had good luck at basket shooting for the second team, making most of them near the basket. We believe more points might have been made by our first team men had there been fewer of the long shots attempted.

The score for the second team is: Klemme 15, Renwick 6.

The first string men defeated the Renwick first team by a score of 21 to 10.

Last Game Here For Gibson

Oral Gibson played his last game with Klemme High as he is leaving the latter part of this week for West Liberty, where he will make his home hereafter with his mother. We regret very much to lose Oral for his work in school has been of a high order and he shows good promise of being a splendid basket ball man.

Rowan Game Postponed

Our game with Rowan for Friday night has been postponed on account of the Declamatory Contest here on the same date. We hope the attendance at this program may show the same enthusiasm as has been shown at our basket ball games.

Record Crowd Tuesday Night

Our receipts at the Renwick games Tuesday night were $57.85, the largest, perhaps, in the history of basket ball in Klemme.

Ten Speakers In Declamatory Contest Here Tomoorow Night

There will be ten speakers at our local contest and winners of each class will contest with the best in other schols at the County contest, to be announced later.

Report On School Nurse

We wonder how many parents have given the nurse's report on their children attention? Sometimes symptoms are not alarming and nature soon restores to normal, but again, they may afford an opportunity to head off a growing weakness that unless checked may develope into a serious handicap throughout life.

We find in consulting the nurse's report left with us:

There were 25 pupils more than 10% underweight

There were 21 pupils more than 10% overweight

46 with defective vision or eye weaknesses

62 with teeth needing attention

80 with bad tonsils

36 with poor posture

6 with ear defects or defective hearing

7 with enlarged glands

9 with poor nasal breathing

58 with poor nutrition.

Lets do our part to remove the serious handicaps, for it may mean the difference between success or failure.

FRISCO AND ROCK ISLAND TO MERGE

12,000 Miles of Trackage to Be United—Transfer Million Shares.

New York.—Consolidation of the St. Louis-San Francisco and the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific railroads, into a new billion dollar system, which will rank among the largest in the country, was forecast in an announcement that the "Frisco" had acquired "a substantial block" of Rock Island stock.

Trackage involved in the consolidation is in excess of 12,000 miles and the valuation of properties involved is $875,000,000.

More than 1,000,000 shares of the stock changed hands during the past two months. An advance of $15 a share was registered.

Control of the Rock Island has heretofore rested with Hayden, Stone & Co., of which Charles Hayden is senior partner and chairman of the board of directors. Mr. Hayden attempted to form a new railroad system by uniting the Rock Island and St. Louis Southwestern. He purchased a controlling interest from Edwin Gould, son of Jay Gould. Failing to win approval of the Interstate Commerce commission, he disposed of his holdings to L. F. Loree, who announced he would form a southwestern system by merging it with the Kansas City Southern and Missouri, Kansas & Texas.

This left the St. Louis-San Francisco, one of the old Gould roads which met financial disaster in 1913, in the position of an orphan in the Southwest, which is highly competitive territory.

A short time later the Frisco was authorized by the commerce commission to acquire control of the Muscle Shoals, Birmingham & Pensacola.

With this controlled road and the Rock Island the new Frisco system will be second to none in size. Its southern terminal will be Pensacola, Fla., on the east and Fort Worth, Texas, on the west. On the north it will serve Chicago and the Twin Cities, on the west Denver, and on the east St. Louis.

New Form of Insulin Gives Further Hopes

Chicago.—Completion of experiments with insulin, which have resulted in its production as a chemically pure crystal, was announced here by Dr. John J. Abel, professor of pharmacology in the John Hopkins medical school, in an address before the Chicago Institute of Medicine.

Production of the drug, it was said, will now be possible in an absolutely pure form. As formerly made it was in the form of a crude solution derived from the pancreas glands of pigs. Its chemical form, as distinct from the organic material with which it is mixed, has not been known before.

It is expected that the new discovery will lead to further knowledge of chemicals which may act as a preventive of diabetes. Insulin, so far, has not been used as a curative for diabetes, but rather as a neutralizing agent which merely checks progress of the disease.

Warns Against Haste in R. R. Consolidations

Washington.—Chairman Joseph B. Eastman, of the Interstate Commerce commission, warned the senate Interstate Commerce committee that railroad consolidations into a few great systems is not a matter to be rushed into headlong.

He asserted that it was entirely possible that a too rosy idea of the economies and benefits to be derived from consolidation is being painted. In presenting his testimony, he submitted the commerce commission's consolidation bill to the committee for its consideration. The bill merely gives the power to the commission to approve or disapprove proposed voluntary consolidations.

SENTENCE FOUR TO ROPE IN ONE DAY

Chicago Judges Set Record in Murder Cases.

Chicago.—Four men were given sentences of death in one day by judges in the Chicago criminal courts. All four had been convicted of committing murders during robberies.

Henry J. Fernekes, the midget bandit, and two companions lost their plea for a new trial before Judge William N. Gemmill and were sentenced to hang on February 19. The other two are John Flannery and Daniel McGeoghan.

Campbell McCarthy, colored nineteen years old, recently found guilty of the murder of Christian Getzen, a watchman, was declared sane by a jury in Judge John P. McGoorty's court and sentenced to hang next Friday, January 29.

Fernekes, Flannery, and McGeoghan were convicted of the murder last March of Michael Swiontkowski, treasurer of the Pulaski Building and Loan society. Swiontkowski was killed during an attempt of the robbers to obtain $11,000 belonging to his organization which was in his possession.

Warns Canada Against Tariff War With U. S.

Ottawa, Ont.—Thomas McMillan, Ontario, Liberal, warned the Canadian people in parliament that Arthur Meighen, Conservative party leader, proposed to start up a tariff war with the United States which would be hurtful to both nations.

"He will start a tariff war with our American neighbors," Mr. McMillan said, "just at a time when the troubles in New England, and all over the states, due to the effects of high protection, are crystallizing into the demand for a low tariff policy in that country, which may result in giving to all Canadian people, more particularly to the farmers, freer, if not free, access into the American market. The world's best market is right at our doors."

In picturing for Canadians what would be lost if Mr. Meighen's tariff war were instituted, Mr. McMillan named Chicago, in sight of the Canadian west, as the world's best cattle market.

Eleven Liners Raided; Agents Seize Liquor

New York.—Federal agents raided eleven ocean liners arriving in New York harbor, seized immense quantities of wines, ale and liquor and furnished Federal Attorney Buckner with evidence for the largest number of libel proceedings against foreign-owned ships he has yet started.

The ships raided included the Franconia and the Adriatic. More than 10,000 bottles of expensive liquor, variously estimated as being worth anywhere from $40,000 to $100,000, were confiscated. Writs for the destruction of the liquor were prepared at once by Buckner's assistants.

Community Building

Small Towns' Growth Shown by Statistics

For many years we have witnessed in this country the phenomena of pronounced population shifts from the rural districts to the cities. While this movement still may be in progress, the development of semi-rural environment has been carried to the place where the big cities of the first magnitude are now growing seemingly no more rapidly than are the small cities and large towns, and we even may be on the threshold of a reaction from the traditional pro-urban migration.

From the most complete and reliable source of building information available in this country, it is found that during the first nine months of 1925 the 25 leading cities of the country, in point of housing construction, enjoyed a building gain of about 17 per cent over the same period of 1924. From the same authority it is learned that 344 cities and towns, exclusive of the 25 metropolises, showed a combined increase of substantially the same percentage. Included in this list of 344 centers were some places with only a few thousand population.

While these figures are not conclusive, they are enough to the point to arouse the interest of the student of current economic conditions, and to justify the hope that the small town is beginning to come into its own.—Thrift Magazine.

Community Joins in Shade-Tree Planting

Residents of Polytechnic, a suburban district of Fort Worth, Texas, are conducting a tree planting campaign. Carried to a successful conclusion, it will result in the parkways alongside every street and avenue in the suburb being lined with shade trees of uniform size and variety.

The movement is a result of the effort of a resident of Avenue M to improve the appearance of his immediate neighborhood. News of the Avenue M beautification project spread rapidly to other streets in the suburb, and its sheer merit awakened the public conscience, with the result that now there is hardly a street in the district on which some self-appointed committee is not trying to put over a similar program.

Indications are that each street will select a different variety of tree. Thus a motorist in a few years may be able to drive through the suburb in the shade of trembling sycamores, return by another route shielded from the summer's sun by stately American elms—a pride of Texas as well as New England cities—thence to Greater Fort Worth on a boulevard lined with pecans, the official state tree of Texas.—Christian Science Monitor.

Home Judged by Outside

While it is desirable to keep both the interior and the exterior of your home in good repair, do not expend all your efforts on the inside, as the greater wear and tear results on the part of your home that is exposed to the elements.

In addition to protecting your investment in the home by proper care, your efforts will tend to stimulate interest in the upkeep of their homes by all your neighbors, who will usually not wish to be outdone. This is another way of adding indirectly to the value of your own home, as it is to a certain extent judged by the quality of its neighbors.

And in the event that you are at any time forced to dispose of your home you will find that a well-kept home will sell easier and at a much better price than if allowed to run down to such an extent that it would require costly repairs.

Good Roads and the Town

Beyond question the extensive building of good roads has brought about a new status for the town, big and little, as it has for the country generally. What this status finally shall be is not in the nature of a problem so much as a process that is bound to take its own course to a large extent. Good roads extend the commercial reach of every town. Whether that reach may be made profitable depends much on the town itself, for the reach of other places has been extended similarly. Better roads bring into or near the towns greatly increased travel Whether that travel shall be made profitable or negligible from a business point of view depends again very much on the invitation the town affords.

Boost Home Town

There may be a great many features about your home town of which you cannot be justly proud, lots of things going just the other way, the way you don't want them to go. Just the same when you go on the outside to speak of the affairs and the progressiveness of your home town—smile. You never see families with any degree of intelligence displaying dislikes and hatreds once the members have transferred the seat of operations to the outside.—Albany-Decatur Daily.

Keep House in Order

THE KITCHEN CABINET

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour:
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

A VARIETY OF DISHES

For a change when preparing a brace of rabbits, try:

Rabbit Pie (Missouri Style).—Skin and disjoint the rabbits and cover with boiling water. Add one sliced onion, a slice of bacon, a bay leaf, one teaspoonful of salt, a dash of pepper, and a tablespoonful of kitchen bouquet; simmer tightly covered until tender. Remove the meat, thicken the stock with flour, add any more seasoning needed and strain over the meat. Place a biscuit dough over the meat and bake half an hour.

Potted Pigeon.—Clean, wash and truss the pigeons, season and brown in a small amount of fat—pork fat will be best; add boiling water to cover, with one chopped onion, one bay leaf, a slice of carrot, a sprig of parsley and salt to taste. Cook until tender, remove the pigeon and thicken the liquor with flour mixed with enough cold water to blend, let boil, then pour over the pigeons and serve. The pigeons will require about two hours cooking, depending upon their age.

Baked Ham.—Cover a ham with cold water and bring to the simmering point, simmer gently for two or three hours, until the skin loosens, then put the ham well drained and dried into a baking pan, after removing the skin. Mix a teaspoonful of mustard in two cupfuls of boiling water, add one cupful of vinegar and pour the mixture over the ham, beating frequently during the baking. When the ham is well baked, cover with brown sugar, press down firmly, adding a few cloves; dredge the top with flour and return to the oven to brown. The cloves will flavor the ham better if cooked in it during the whole time of baking.

Baked Pork Chops.—Chop some of the fat from the chops very fine, add two tablespoonfuls of the fat to one and one-half cupfuls of bread crumbs, a fourth of a cupful of boiling water, salt and a beaten egg. Lay six chops in a baking pan and cover with the dressing, adding pepper to taste. Cover the bottom of the pan with boiling water and bake in a moderate oven, basting occasionally, one hour.

Apple Preserves.—Make a sirup of a pound of sugar, a pint of water, the grated rind of a lemon, the juice of a lemon; let boil briskly five minutes. Drop quarters of apple into the sirup and cook gently until clear: then set aside to cool. Boil the sirup down, arrange the apple in glass jars and pour over the fruit in the jars. Seal tightly.

Winter Sandwiches.

During the winter more nourishing sandwich fillings are enjoyed.

Deviled Ham Sandwiches.—Mix one can of deviled ham with one or two finely chopped pickles and moisten with mayonnaise or cooked salad dressing. Spread thin slices of bread with mayonnaise, and an equal number very thinly with prepared mustard; spread the latter with the ham mixture and cover with the remaining slices. Press edges together, trim off the crusts and shape as desired. Serve with potato salad and coffee.

Chicken and Nut Sandwiches.—Finely chop the white meat of cold boiled chicken. Season with salt, pepper and moisten with mayonnaise dressing. Shape thin slices of white bread with a crescent, spread thinly one-half the slices with mayonnaise and very thinly sliced almonds or Brazil nuts. Spread the remaining half with the chicken mixture; put together in pairs, press the edges to keep them in shape, arrange in baskets or on sandwich plates. Serve with ripe olives, sweet pickles and dainty cheese balls.

Onion and Bacon Sandwiches.—Broil thin slices of bacon until brown, drain, chop fine. Peel and finely chop one southern onion—there should be one part bacon to two parts onion. Mix thoroughly and moisten with mayonnaise dressing. Spread thin slices of bread with creamed butter, then with mayonnaise; spread half of the slices with the prepared ham, press together and cut into triangles.

Hot Chicken Sandwiches.—Chop medium fine some cold cooked chicken. Have ready rounds of toast, hot and buttered. Slightly moisten the chicken with hot chicken gravy and spread half the rounds with the chicken mixture. Cover with the remaining rounds and arrange on hot plates, pour over the hot gravy and serve at once.

Chocolate Sandwiches.—Melt one-half cupful of broken chocolate, add one-fourth cupful each of sugar and hot water or cream. Cook five minutes, stirring constantly. Add a teaspoonful of vanilla and two teaspoonfuls of butter. When slightly cool spread on sponge cake, lady fingers or white buttered bread. Cut into fancy shapes

COSTUME SLIPS NOW IN FAVOR; FABRICS FOR TOTS' FROCKS

NOW that the costume slip has supplanted the petticoat in point of favor it behooves the well-dressed woman to see to it that her wardrobe contains a goodly supply. To buy is one way of doing this; to make is another. Some of us prefer the latter for great the glory in being able to say: "I made it myself." To such the following hints are respectfully subscribed.

For practical everyday wear slips buy pongee silk. It tubs perfectly, and is genteel in appearance. Several of these slips should be made up by the home seamstress now in readiness for spring.

A washable white satin or radium slip is also easily home-made, and at least one is necessary to the well-regulated wardrobe.

When it comes to the popular Italian silk costume slips the subject takes on an element of color importance. This is especially true for the coming season for the trend to exquisite pastel color combinations is as apparent in fashionable underthings as in the outer costume.

If one cannot afford to purchase pure silk knit yardage, then ask for rayon-knit. It is eminently satisfactory and costs so much less than genuine Italian silk.

The new color combinations can be carried out as exquisitely in one instance as the other. Here are some suggestions for lovely and up-to-the-moment color effects: Gray with violet or periwinkle alternate borderings as shown in the picture; maize with mint green piping outlining two tiers of scallops around the skirt portion; seashell with wide border of rose in solid tint finishing the hemline.

Some of the more expensive white satin or silk, also flesh-colored, gain a flare through insets of lace, adding a band of lace about the top with lace bands over the shoulder.

Last, but not least, make a costume slip of gold or silver cloth, for it can be fashioned at home so economically. This sort of a slip becomes a treasured possession, for all sorts of sheer or lace frocks can be worn over it effectively.

Style decrees that little folks' clothes must be featured with an abundance of cunning handiwork—so here is mother's opportunity to keep busy with needle and gay-colored yarns during the long, tedious inter-season period when winter refuses to take its ice and snow and depart from hence.

There is any amount of fun to be had collecting lovely remnants in the clearance sales which take place at this time of the year. Fashions are so cunning for youngsters it adds to the joy to choose this pattern and that and then "get busy" following directions.

Think of the pleasure in store for the home seamstress who has in contemplation the making of a little fine white net frock, for net is one of the materials favored for little girls' dainty dresses, which will serve now for wear at winter parties and later for summertime dress-up affairs. The fairylike sleeveless straight-from-the-shoulder frock in the picture is made of net, although colored voile could be used just as pleasingly. This dainty model is really quite unusual, first on account of its being made in net and then because of the unique embellishment of quaint green geese which are figuratively sailing on green water, as interpreted by the embroidered design. The geese are done in cross-stitch with fuzzy angora wool. There are other colors introduced in the scene and about the neck, where Antwerp blue and tangerine floss enter into the scheme.

Another item to keep mother busy is smocking. For no one's little girl is expected to go through the spring and summer season without owning several smocked ginghams, voiles and dotted swisses.

Myriads of little ruffles are finding their way also on lovely pastel-colored dresses.

STRAIGHT TALKS WITH AUNT EMMY

ON HOW TO LEAVE AN ESTATE

"Do you know, Aunty," said Helen, as she accepted a cup of tea from Aunt Emmy, "I feel terribly sorry for Mrs. Strong."

"Yes," agreed Aunt Emmy, "it will be hard for her. She is such a dependent, helpless, little thing."

"Oh, I don't mean that," interrupted Helen. "Her feelings are so hurt because, as she says, her husband publicly insulted her by not making her executrix and trustee of his estate."

"Good gracious, child, did she say that!" exclaimed Aunt Emmy, setting her cup down with a bang.

'Yes, she did, Aunty," said Helen, enjoying the sensation she had made "I determined to make the most of it "and I'm sure I agree with her. 'ea of that old man appointing company to look after Mrs. s money. It isn't as though e wasn't plenty of it. The Strongs the richest people in town, I guess "

'Well, for mercy's sakes!" cried Aunt Emmy, disgust in every syllable, ' don't beat all! You are as big as she is then!"

t do you mean, Aunt Emmy?" Helen with dignity. "I think ning short of disgraceful for a n to show that he has no confidence in his wife by putting his money in strangers' hands to be doled out to her as they see fit."

"You never thought that up, Helen," said Aunt Emmy, "that's Mrs. Strong. She always talks as though she was living in a story book, poor, silly, little thing"

Helen blushed and Aunt Emmy went —"Do you know what it means to minister an estate, especially a big one like Mr. Strong's?"

'Why, no," stammered Helen, "but must be simple."

unt Emmy sniffed. "Simple! Let tell you a little about it. When a dies the things he owns cease for time to be anybody's property and become his estate. The property passes from his control on his death naturally, and as his estate it is controlled and supervised by the Court which will be in charge of the estate for many months probably. First this Court finds out whether or not there is a will and if the will is valid. Then it must find out about the executor. If the will is properly drawn and valid, it will be 'admitted to probate.' The persons who witnessed it must be found and examined.

"The executor must satisfy the Court as to fitness and willingness to perform the many arduous duties involved. Perhaps he will have to furnish a bond, to assure the Court of his financial responsibility. He must assemble all the so-called assets, have them valued and file an inventory and appraisal of them with the Court. All the debts against the estate must be collected The settlement of all claims against persons and corporations is a job no one without a thorough knowledge of business can undertake.

"In an estate like Mr. Strong's there is sure to be a certain amount of financial negotiation that demands banking knowledge. Then the executor must pay claims against the estate in the order of precedence laid down by law. Also you know state inheritance and federal estate taxes must be met promptly. Finally, after the estate is settled as to claims it has and claims against it, the executor must see that the various bequests are made."

"Oh, Aunty, don't tell me any more. I never thought that there were so many complicated things to be done. Poor Mrs. Strong never knew a thing about business."

"Mr. Strong knew that," remarked Aunt Emmy dryly, "and don't you suppose he had his children in mind, too? He wanted his estate handled so that the children and Mrs. Strong would be protected and assured of a good, comfortable living all their lives, with something to go on to the grandchildren. Even if Mrs. Strong were a business woman, no one could tell how long she would live to administer the estate. He knew that the trust company would not die, nor lose its faculties, nor be influenced by personal feeling so that it might be unjust to some one, and that it represents some of the best business and banking judgment in town."

"Well, I guess old man Strong knew what he was doing!" said Helen.—Anne B. Aymes.

The more recently adopted method of killing the common barberry which spreads black stem rust of small grains is by the use of such chemicals as salt and kerosene, according to the Department of Agriculture. These methods have several advantages over the digging method formerly used. They are less laborious, cheaper and more certain. This is especially true if bushes are growing in stony ground where digging is difficult. Department Circular 356 tells all about how to use this method.—Banker-Farmer.

He Knew His Stuff

A man and his wife who had both been brought up in a country town decided to spend their winter holiday in Philadelphia, where, according to the rumor, the streets were almost paved with gold.

Having spent an enjoyable day inspecting the sights, they repaired to a theatre, of which they had heard a great deal.

In the interval the fireproof curtain was let down. In the center was printed the word, "Asbestos."

"Now what does that mean, Lemuel?" asked the wife pointing to the curtain.

"Oh, that's a Latin word," replied Lemuel blandly. "It means 'welcome.' "

HAMMILL VISITS HOME OF HIS SISTER WHO IS ILL

BRITT, Jan. 25.—Governor John Hammill arrived Saturday for an over Sunday visit at the home of Mrs. C. D. Welty who is seriously ill. Mrs. Hammill is expected next week.

A farmer in the south part of the state returned home from hunting the other day and found his neighbor just leaving the house, and being of a jealous nature he drew his gun and filled the man's legs with fine shot. A lawsuit followed, and it was brought out in the trial that the man was there simply to borrow the local newspaper. The lawsuit cost $75 and the doctor bill was $50; and $2, the price of the local paper, would have saved the whole trouble. Not much economy in that.

Try This On Pete!

The man walked into a drug store to buy a bottle. Seeing the size he wanted he inquired as to the cost.

"Well, sir, if you just want the bottle, I'll have to charge you five cents for it, but if you get something in it, I won't charge you anything."

"All right. Put a cork in it, will you?"

Considerate

"Won't you let me teach you how to play cards, dear, I want you to know all about them when we are married."

"How lovely. What game are you going to teach me?"

"Solitaire."

Merely A Matter of an H

A Cockney was being shown over an American estate, which he intended to purchase. Suddenly he was attracted by a peculiar screeching.

"I say, old chap," he said to the agent, "what was that noise?'

"An owl."

"My word, my dear man, I know that—but who was 'owling?"

Old Crusoe Knew

Every business man in Klemme knows the story of Robinson Crusoe, how he was stranded on an island with only a goat, parrot and ablack man as his companfans, and how badly he wanted to get off of that island. But most of them do not know that it was advertising that got him off. He had only a ragged shirt with which to do his advertising, but he stuck it on a pole, planted the pole in the ground, and waited. He didn't get discouraged when no one came the first day—no good advertiser does. But he kept advertising his predicament by means of that old shirt waving in the air—and finally he got results. If Robinson Crusoe with one old shirt could reach the people he sought, how much more easy is it for merchants in this territory to reach the people they want to sell goods to through the columns of a modern, hometown newspaper? Now that the winter buying season is in full swing, this is a pretty good thing to devote a little study to.

"Old Hickory" Smoked Salt

Farmers everywhere are now salting and smoking their meat AT THE SAME TIME with "Old Hickory Smoked Salt—the salt that's smoked with hickory wood smoke.

The smoke is on the salt, and pentrates through the fresh meat readily during cure, giving the meat an appetizing flavor and keeping qualities that could never be obtained with the old smoke-house methods—and with ONE HALF THE WORK.

Old Hickory Smoked Salt is simple to use. Just use it instead of ordinary salt in your curing formula. Then when your meat is ready to come out of the salt, the job is done. No fires to tend, less work, less truoble, less risk due to warm days.

No wonder farmers everywhere are giving up the old smoke house method after once using Old Hickory Smoked Salt!

SEASON'S CHAMPION FISH STORY

The champion "fish" story comes from Fairmont, and the originator of it declares it is the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. He avers he was hunting on the shores of a Martin county lake in October, so the story runs, when a mallard duck arose in front of him. While aiming at the duck, he noticed a pheasant on the limb of a tree directly in line with the duck and when he pulled the trigger both the duck and the pheasant feel dead. A large pickerel frightened by the report of the gun, jumped out on the shore and struck a tree with such momentum that a squirrel was shaken out of his nest and landed beside the big fish. The pickerel, in floundering about struck the squirrel with its enormous tail and it was rendered unconscious. A jack rabbit had been a witness to this wholesale destruction of life to such an extent that it was unable to move and the hunter caught it in his hands. The total bag was one pheasant, one mallard duck, one pickerel, one squrirel, and one rabbit, which when considered that only one shot was fired, is remarkable. The pickerel weighed 19 pounds.

Now you tell one!

Jerrold carefully assisted Prudence and Jerry into the car and sat in the corner beside them, holding Jerry's hand.

Jerrold would have considered it an affectation to have a chauffeur drive him about town, "able-bodied and in my right mind for the most part," as he always said, but on rare and state occasions like the present he had one of the boys from the factory take them out while he sat with the others in the tonneau of the limousine, rigidly erect and alert and always prepared for the worst.

Jerry laughed at him. "Settle down, father, settle down," she urged, snuggling her fingers closer into his hand. "We'll die together, en famille, that's one comfort."

Jerry's fingers were like ice. But there was nothing of drooping sadness in her pose; rather with a strained alertness she remained stiffly upright, her eyes brilliant, her slender chin tilted to an unwontedly high degree.

They knew everyone at the clubhouse and as they made their way to the table reserved for them in a far corner they were obliged to stop by many chairs for a laughing word with one and another. They saw Duane on the moment of their entrance. He was at a table with Irvin Weatherby and his wife and Edith, the oldest of the three daughters. Happily, that table was not directly on the aisle they passed through. They lifted their hands to Jerry as she went by, nodding, laughing, and Jerry swept them all in a quick, bright greeting, forming the words, "I'll see you later," with her lips as she passed.

Duane was amazed at the studied perfection of her manner, the absolutely impersonal friendliness of her glance.

"Let me get someone to sit with us," Jerrold suggested, as they reached their table. "I'm afraid we may seem dull. We should have made up a party."

Jerry put a pleading hand on his arm. "No, father, please. I'd so much rather be—just by ourselves."

"I don't want him to think you—we—I don't want anyone to think—anything."

Jerrold floundered for words. In his partisanship of Jerry, he would have no stranger, not Duane Allerton nor any other, have a chance to suspect her of any loneliness or subject to any slight.

Jerry smiled gratefully for his concern as she slipped prettily into her chair. She shook her head.

"You certainly are a sweet old thing, father. But I am not trying to impress him. I don't care to make him jealous. I don't want to try any childish bluffing. I just feel like having you and mother. So why bother?"

For at least the thousandth time in his life Jerrold told himself proudly that Jerry was a little brick. She looked about the great room with her usual air of friendly interest, nodded to her friends here and there, chatted a little with those near her, and discussed the gowns, complexions and coiffures of the other women with her mother. She even made a brave pretense of eating her dinner as it was placed before her. But when once in a while her fingers touched her father's hand, the icy chill of them cut him like a flash.

At first, in his loyalty to her, he would not even look across to the Weatherby table after that first greeting as they entered the room. But finally, when he realized that Jerry had herself perfectly in hand and needed no anxiety of his, he turned that way. Duane's eyes, smoldering, somber, were fixed upon her lovely profile, the cloudy blackness of her dark hair, the creamy whiteness of her throat and the shoulder half turned from him.

Jerrold could not withhold a friendly, sympathetic smile, and Duane responded with a grateful, unsmiling nod.

"Any fool could see what's in his mind," Jerrold thought. "The whole town will be buzzing with it now."

When they went into the ballroom the orchestra was playing. They found a pleasant place for Prudence to sit, and Jerry danced with her father. Then she danced with young Doctor Morse, and then with Newton Macklin, each time returning to her place beside her mother. It was after the third dance, when Duane had performed his duty as guest to his hostess and to Edith and had sat out a stupid dance with old Mr. Weatherby, that he excused himself with stumbling words, and with stubborn determination, with trepidation in his heart, he turned his steps toward Jerry.

They saw him coming. Jerrold's pleasant smile froze upon his features, and he toyed nervously with the narrow chain at his watch. Prudence held her breath. Only Jerry kept up her light, bright chatter, although her fingers shook. Duane continued doggedly toward her, his eyes upon the cloudy blackness of her hair.

Jerrold spoke quickly as he drew near, holding out his hand. His voice was very friendly.

"Oh, hello, Duane. How do you like the Middle West at its very wickedest?"

"Oh very much, sir, thank you." Duane clung to his hand like a man drowning, but Jerrold passed him on, perforce, to Prudence.

"You've met my wife, I know—"

"Oh, yes, Mrs. Harmer. But it seems a very long time. It is very good to see you again."

Prudence lifted her hand, lifted both hands, greeted him with a warm, almost foolish effusiveness, but she could not postpone the inevitable. He looked beyond her to Jerry.

"G—good evening," he said lamely, and his eyes were riveted to the haughty lift of her chin.

Jerry smiled. Mindful of the eyes of the friendly, always interested home town, she lifted a slender, ice-cold hand and dropped it for a moment in his. She caught her breath at the sudden contact. If he retained it, if he drew it warmly into his, caressed it, as he had done in the studio that unforgotten and unforgettable night, she knew she could not withstand the tenderness of his touch. Duane held it barely a second longer than is allowed by a strict convention, and released it slowly.

"W—will you sit down?" she offered generously, in gratitude for his relinquishment.

The way he dropped into a chair beside her gave somehow the impression of a ship tossed in a stormy sea, suddenly and surprisingly finding that its anchor held.

"Oh, mother, look!" said Jerry brightly. "There's Judge Harris and his new little wife from California." She explained to Duane: "Judge Harris is one of the city pillars, has been for centuries, it seems. And a few weeks ago he amazed everybody by marrying a seventeen-year-old girl on the Coast. Naturally he is our chief subject of gossip. She is pretty, isn't she? Perhaps people will think she is only his daughter."

Duane professed a tremendous interest in the wild marriage of the old judge, and the four of them discussed it down to the minutest detail, until the subject sank of its own weight and died away.

There was an awkward interval.

"Will you dance, Mrs. Harmer?"

Prudence stood up at once. "I'd love to," she declared, quite as if she meant it.

Then Jerry laughed. She touched her hand to Duane's arm. "Let me warn you! Mother cannot dance. She is likely to do perfectly terrible things on the floor. Father and I have been teaching her to dance for twenty years, and she can't do it yet! She's only trying to be polite to you."

"Oh," Jerry," protested Prudence, blushing. "Sometimes I am sure I get along quite nicely."

"I am not a bit alarmed," Duane assured her. And then to Jerry, very pleadingly, "Please wait."

Prudence had a little difficulty getting the step at first. "Is—is it a waltz?" she asked apologetically. "I never can tell the silly things apart."

He laughed at her confusion. "It's a fox-trot. Never mind. We'll get on finely, I know. Just walk. Why, your daughter was very unjust to you—you dance famously! And all my fears were groundless."

Prudence was in a desperate quandary. She so wanted to be pleasant to the poor boy, but when she talked she always lost the step. She danced conscientiously half-way around the room, before she spoke.

"I am so glad to see you again, Mr. Allerton. I—I wish things were a little different. I know we should be very good friends—if we had a chance."

"Would you mind—I suppose you would rather not call me—Duane," he said hopefully yet diffidently.

"I'd love to. It is a nice name, isn't it? And Jerrold and I always speak of you as Duane—when we are alone."

Duane smiled a little ruefully at that. "Your husband is wonderful to me," he said. "I never met anyone like him before. He—he is just fine."

"Yes, isn't he? I knew you would like him."

Duane patiently helped her back into the rhythm, and when they were dancing smoothly again, unable to resist his great desire to talk of Jerry, he said:

"She is so beautiful, isn't she? She seems lovelier every time I see her."

"Yes, she is a beautiful girl. Everyone says so."

"She always seems so—well poised—so sophisticated. She is always sure of herself, never perturbed. Sophisticated, that is the word for it. That was what deceived me about her at first."

"Yes, she looks sophisticated, but really she is the most innocent and artless thing imaginable. You'd be surprised."

"Yes. I was."

"Girls are like that now. They get that air of advanced maturity when they are no more than children. They talk of the most intimate and—secret—things in the most outspoken manner. And they don't really know what they are talking about! They pick up a lot of superficial expressions from the books they read, from plays, from movies—they think it is quite clever to repeat what they hear—clever and just a bit shocking. At heart they are just as innocent as we were when we were young. But they sound—oh, so very much worse! If the twins had talked the way girls do now—well, I should probably have spanked them."

"I don't think the others are like Jerry, though—such an air of assurance, and such artless innocence beneath it."

"Oh, yes, Duane, most young girls are like that in the beginning. And men never understand it. They think girls really know and understand the things they talk about so freely. They don't at all. And so quite innocently they lead them on and on—"

"And whose fault, Mrs. Harmer, in the end? It was mine, I know, in our case. But I was sure she was—playing the game. I never dreamed of anything else. The way she looked, the way she talked—"

"Why, Duane, I've heard those girls, Jerry and her friends, say things to each other, discuss things, that honestly I should not dream of saying to one of my sisters—even to Jerrold! They don't know what they're talking about, I tell you. They think it's smart to appear sophisticated and blase—and at heart they are children. Oh, after a while they learn—but they haven't yet. Isn't it too bad that men don't understand them—as their mothers do?"

When they returned to Jerrold and Jerry, who were waiting for them, Prudence said brightly:

"Now, you see, Jerry, I did very well, after all! I was only out of step a time or two, wasn't I, Dua—Mr. Allerton? And we talked all the time, and you know usually I can't talk when I'm dancing. I think I may learn after all—in time."

Others came up, joined the little group, chatted a while and drifted on. When the music began again Duane turned to Jerry.

"W—will you dance?"

"Yes," she answered briefly.

When they had moved away, Jerrold turned to Prudence.

"She can say what she likes, and you may believe it if you want to. But Jerry wanted to dance with him. Half a dozen boys came up and asked her to dance, and she made excuses every time. She was just waiting for him to come back."

Prudence smiled at his stupidity and said nothing.

Jerry and Duane had danced the full length of the room without a word between them.

"Jerry," he said at last, very softly, "I realize, of course, that you wore this gown mostly in defiance, but I hope it was just a little bit for remembrance too."

"Mr. Allerton, please—"

"Duane," he interrupted. "You called me Duane in New York that night."

She lifted a slender shoulder, abandoned the use of the name entirely. "I would not for the world humiliate you before other people. But you must help me. They know I met you in New York—they are watching us together. Make it easy for me, won't you? Stay away from me. Talk to others—"

"Jerry, how can you ask me to see anyone else when you are here?"

"Oh, please don't!"

They danced for a while in silence.

"Jerry! Was it a little for remembrance?"

"Mr. Allerton, I ask you to help me. I am trying so hard to let things go off—nicely—so no one will suspect—anything. Don't make it harder for me than it is already."

"But, Jerry, if you would only let me talk to you—just once—let me tell you—let me explain—"

"There isn't a thing in the world to tell me, a thing in the world to explain. I understand you perfectly—now. And I am not such a fool as to think you don't understand me as well. I know you do." And then she added bitterly, "With the experience you've had."

His eyes contracted sharply at the cruelty of her words. "You didn't need to turn the knife, Jerry. The first cut was sharp enough."

Again they danced in silence.

"Jerry, I love you. Doesn't that make any difference?"

"No. If you love me—it does not make any difference."

After a long interval he said, very softly: "Jerry, tell me, when you are with me—like this—doesn't it make you think a little bit—of that night in the studio? You were so sweet, Jerry. You were the loveliest thing I ever saw. I shall never forget the feeling I had when you first looked up at me—the flame-colored gown—your cloudy black hair—and, most of all, that brave, glad brightness in your eyes. Oh, Jerry, it was a wonderful night—you can't deny that—it was a beautiful night—you can't—"

"Don't do that!" Jerry's voice was very low, very intense. "Don't! I am trying—so hard—to let things go—When you talk to me—like that—I've just got to be insulting to you to—keep—"

"To keep from loving me, Jerry," he finished, when her voice faltered.

Jerry lifted her misty blue eyes under the shadowing fringe of the dark lashes, looked at him, directly, very frankly, and answered surprisingly:

"Yes."

"Oh, Jerry," he pleaded. "You love me already. You can't put me off any longer, you—"

A slight, almost imperceptible movement, and Jerry was free of his arm. She called softly across to Newton Macklin, standing near them:

"Oh, Newton, we have been looking everywhere for you." When he had joined them she slipped her fingers in his arm. She looked at Duane with ice-cold eyes, and smiled, with ice-cold lips. "It was a wonderful dance, Mr. Allerton. Will you tell mother I am going with Newton to find Rae Forsythe, and that I shall stay with the girls for a while? Thank you so much."

Duane merely bowed, said nothing, and turned away.

"Newton," Jerry whispered faintly, "I feel sick. Will you take me home? Mother is having such a nice time I don't want to bother her. Will you take me home, and then come back and tell her later on?"

CHAPTER X

Jerry's Plaything

In the first week of December there was a heavy Middle West blizzard, and for two days the city cowered under stinging winds and cutting sleet. After that came a still, biting cold, that warmed gradually to a blanketing snowfall. And on the fifth day when the streets were packed to a slick but solid bottom, Jerry, unable to endure the brooding loneliness of her thoughts any longer, got out the roadster and went for a careful ice-cold ride between fields of dazzling whiteness, along roadways flanked with snow-bowed trees.

It was late in the afternoon when she turned back. As she drove through town, at the corner of Sixth and Locust streets she was held up by the traffic officer, standing foremost of the cars awaiting his signal. Jerry waited, as always, with alert eyes on the officer's hand, her foot poised for a sharp pressure on the gas throttle to make the quick get-away on which she prided herself, when the tide of the traffic was turned.

"Jerry! You beautiful thing!"

The half-tender, half-mocking voice was directly beside her. Jerry caught her breath. She did not turn her head, did not waver her intent gaze upon the detaining officer. She knew without looking that he was close to the car, leaning toward her, his chin grimly set, his eyes unsmiling. Jerry knew she could endure no more.

In that moment she received the signal. She flung the car into gear, pressed hard upon the throttle, and the "Baby" sprang forward like a catapult. Jerry heard a warning whistle from the officer to reprove her for her reckless speed, but she did not pause nor look behind. She drove with rigid, iron-set muscles up the beautiful, glistening avenue, and whirled into the garage behind the house. Jerry had reached the end of her resistance. As in her childish days she had struggled with the broken toy until convinced of her impotency, so now she realized the ineffectiveness of her struggle against the love of this man. She would leave it to Prudence and Jerrold.

Meerschaum Pipes

Meerschaum is the name given to one of the silicates of magnesium. It is a mineral of white, creamy color, and receives its name from its appearance and the position in which it is sometimes found, suggesting that it was petrified foam from the sea. It is obtained from various places, but the best quality comes from Asia Minor. Rich deposits of it exist at a place called Sepetdje, about twenty miles from Eskichehir. It is soft when dug, but becomes hard when dry. Most of it is sent to Vienna, or was before the war, where it was made into tobacco pipes, many of them highly artistic. Similar pipes are made in London and Paris. The pipes are cut into shape and afterward polished.

"Why, Uncle Jim! You look ten years younger!"

"When I saw you a couple of months ago, I made up my mind you were getting old. At least you looked it."

"Yes, Billie, and I felt old. No appetite, couldn't sleep nights—one day just like another, and none of them any good. I knew constipation was at the bottom of it, but it seemed the more laxatives I took the worse I got. Then one day I saw Nell giving Nujol to my little grandson. The doctor had prescribed it for the baby, but I found out it's just the thing for old fellows like me, too.

"I tell you, Billie, it keeps me feeling fine all the time. My appetite's back and I sleep like a child. If I look any younger, Nujol gets the credit."

Nujol helps Nature in Nature's own way

Middle age brings on a decrease in the natural lubricating secretions in the intestine. Then you need Nujol. It supplies the deficiency of the natural lubricant. Medical authorities approve Nujol because it is gentle, safe and natural in its action.

Constipation is dangerous for anybody. Nujol is safe for everybody. Nujol simply softens the waste matter and thus permits thorough and regular elimination without overtaxing the intestinal muscles. It is not a medicine.

You can take Nujol for any length of time without ill effects. It should be taken regularly in accordance with the directions on each bottle. Unlike laxatives, it does not form a habit and can be discontinued at any time.

Ask your druggist for Nujol today and begin to enjoy the perfect health that is possible only when elimination is normal and regular.

Women Need a Mild Laxative —Not a "Physic"

Countless girls and women now know how foolish and needless it is to "purge" and "physic" themselves to hold sick headaches, dizziness, biliousness, sallow skin, colds, or sour, gassy stomach.

They have found that Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin helps to establish natural bowel "regularity" even for those heretofore chronically constipated. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin not only causes a gentle, easy bowel movement but, best of all, it never gripes, sickens or upsets the most delicate girl or woman. Besides, it is absolutely harmless and so pleasant that even a cross, feverish, bilious, sick child gladly takes it.

GOOD ROADS

POSTAL SERVICE IS BEING AIDED

The postal service of the United States is today using more than one million miles of public roads in the delivery of daily mail. In delivering mail to 30,000,000 individuals on rural routes, 1,205,572 miles of highway are being used every day. Notwithstanding the great increase in mileage covered through the improvement of roads, there are more than 14,000,000 persons waiting to be added as soon as the service can be extended.

These interesting points have been brought out as a result of an investigation conducted by the American Association of State Highway Officials to find out who is really using the highways.

"The Postal department is only one of the many large users of the highways," says the report, and more firms are turning to the roads as a means of final distribution for their products.

"The importance of the roads in the modern scheme of transportation cannot be overestimated, for the tap roots of trade of many of the large and medium-sized companies now extend down to the smallest communities. This is especially true of those corporations which sell small unit commodities through the mail and through the small retailer.

"One of the three elements used by the federal government in the distribution of funds to states for roads is the mileage of post roads used in each state for rural mail delivery. Our inquiry has brought out the fact that in the past five years, through the improvement of roads, the Postal department has been able to add 1,550 new rural routes which carry mail to 226,300 families. The general improvement in roads has enabled the Postal department to lengthen the mileage of 2,449 established routes.

The report of the association concludes by calling attention to the fact that "the ordinary length of a rural route is 24 miles, and where routes are over unimproved roads, this represents an all-day job of delivery, but road improvement has enabled Uncle Sam to lengthen many routes and give additional service to rural families. In some instances carriers are able to carry to more families and do the job in half the time required ten years ago, due to the paving of the roads."

Four Important Factors Making for Road Safety

The four important factors affecting safety in highway traffic, said Edward S. Jordan at the recent meeting in Cleveland of the safety council of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, are brakes, steering, easy vision and lights.

"Satisfactory lighting," added Mr. Jordan, "has been made difficult by conflicting laws in different states, but there has been increasing progress and most manufacturers have made light control easy by placing the switch on the steering column or in the center of the steering wheel.

"The uninterrupted vision of the driver has been improved. The front pillars on enclosed cars have been narrowed through the use of steel construction, and one-piece windshields are becoming more in vogue, while the almost universal use of automatic windshield cleaners is a protection against obscured vision from rain or snow.

Lime Keeps Roads Firm

Experiments of engineers have developed, it is claimed, that mixture of 2 to 5 per cent of hydrated lime with the top surfacing of country dirt roads has ended excessive rutting and clinging of the clay to feet of animals and tires of automobiles, after rainfalls. The clay and lime mixture does not stick. Instead it tends to smooth out and pack down more quickly than does untreated surfacing. The roads also respond more readily to dragging.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Good Roads Hints

Water damages more roads than anything else, so clean out roadside ditches.

State and county roads by the end of this year will total approximately 500,000 miles, according to estimates of the bureau of public roads.

* * *

A good road soon pays for itself in savings of vehicle running expenses for its users, as everybody knows, but the waste goes on until it is improved.

The United States is now credited with building the finest highways in the world.

A recent issue of the Detroit Schop at tells of the crusade against jaywalking by the children themselves. Those guilty of the offense are brought before a court composed of the pupils and are tried according to regular court procedure. If the court finds against them, they are given various jobs to do in the way of sentences which make them more careful the next time.

Alice, the Color Blender

By DOROTHY PIPER

(Copyright.)

ALMOST invariably, after every meal, Alice Day would take her work-basket to the living room where her clever fingers would ply a needle in and out of some sheer bit of material; and just now she was fashioning a beautiful spread for her brother's bed.

"Humph," exclaimed her brother Danny one evening. "Do I have to sleep under those lumps?"

Alice pretended to be greatly piqued. "These are not lumps, silly," she said, "they are French knots, and you will not sleep under them, you will fold back the spread carefully each night before retiring."

Again Danny voiced his disapproval. "These folderols may be all right, Alice," he declared, "but why don't you use your time to better advantage?"

"That's what I'd say," called an elder sister, Marion, from the kitchen. "Every day I have to scrub these greasy kettles, while Alice sits in the living room and blends colors.

"Now, children, don't quarrel. Alice has an artistic temperament, you know," observed their mother.

"Applesauce!" scoffed Danny, inelegantly. "Well, I hope dad'll always be able to hold down his job. I don't know what Alice could do if forced to support herself."

* * * * * * * * *

No one seemed to notice the look of extreme worry and anxiety upon the face of Mr. Day, as he returned from the office each evening. At last he was obliged to speak of his trouble, and Alice overheard him telling mother.

"Mary," he said brokenly, "I made an unsuccessful business deal last month and lost $1,000. I am afraid Danny will have to sacrifice his college year."

Alice, an innocent eavesdropper, turned pale. How selfish she had been to sit and blend silken threads while her father slaved to give them the luxuries of life!

She scanned the "Help Wanted" columns, and found that Danny spoke the truth when he said there was nothing she could do. Possibly she could be a waitress, so, unknown to the family, she donned a plain black dress, and appeared before the man who had advertised for a girl.

"Had any previous experience?" asked the restaurateur, doubting Alice's ability.

"Yes, sir," she fibbed, thinking of Danny. "I worked at Wilde's for six months."

"Good," said the man. "You may start immediately; begin with that customer in the corner."

Alice knew that a diner must have a glass of water and a pat of butter, so she procured those two articles and stood beside the gentleman, awaiting his order.

"I'll have a cup of coffee and filet mignon," he said in guttural tones.

Alice understood the word "coffee," but the others sounded like jargon. "Flee Meenya"—she passed the order on to the chef.

"What is 'Flee Meenya?'" the cook wanted to know, "meat or fish?"

"I don't know, just 'Flee Meenya,'" faltered Alice. But the chef was unable to grasp her meaning, and gave attention to the other waitresses.—

Alice's customer sat before an empty plate for nearly 45 minutes, then he stalked from the cafe in disgust. The proprietor upbraided Alice and threatened to "fire" her.

Her next customer was a lady, who wanted a pot of tea and a chicken sandwich. This was easy, and Alice went to the kitchen with a smile on her lips, but on her return she slipped and spilled the entire contents of her tray over the woman she was serving.

Luckily, the lady wore a heavy coat and was not scalded, but her garments were saturated with milk and tea. Poor Alice! She sat down and wept. She scarcely heard her irate employer as he ordered her to leave ot once.

The woman was a kindly sort and assured Alice that no harm had been done. She displayed more interest in Alice's towel than she did in her soiled cloak.

"What an exquisite bit of embroidery," she remarked, examing the design, "the blending of colors is real artistry. May I ask who worked it?"

"I did," replied Alice, between sobs.

"Why, my dear girl," exclaimed the lady, "you shouldn't be working in a cafe. Your life work is cut out for you. For weeks I have been searching for an expert needlewoman to embroider a trousseau for my daughter. If you will accept my offer, I can give you work for six months. After that my friends will be glad to employ you, I know."

The lady was so anxious to secure Alice's services that she paid her in advance, and Alice forwarded the money to her parents. Danny was able to return to college, but it was several weeks before he knew how much he owed to his sister. Then one day he went to her and shyly expressed his gratitude.

"Gee, Al," he said, "I'm awfully sorry for the way I have talked to you. I'll do anything if you'll only forgive me."

"Will you wear pink butterflies on your football suit?" asked Alice teasingly.

"Yep, I'll even do that," laughed Danny, and he kissed her on the nape of the neck.

North America's Richest Virgin Land for $15 to $20 per Acre

"I haven't the chance that Dad had. When he was young land was cheap, but now—"

If that has been your point of view—if you have felt that your father had a chance which is denied to you—think of Canada, the New Giant of the North, with three hundred million acres of the finest agricultural land in the world. You know what has happened in the Western States; use your imagination to picture what must happen in Canada. See the new Iowas rising out of the Canadian prairies!

The soil is newer; richer—and cheaper. Railroads have already opened up the new country. Canada's railroad service is the pride of the Canadian people, and the freight rates on the farmer's products are lower than in the United States. Dollars saved in freight are dollars added to the farmer's bank account. Roads, schools, churches, market towns, rural telephones—they're all there now, awaiting the new settler—awaiting you.

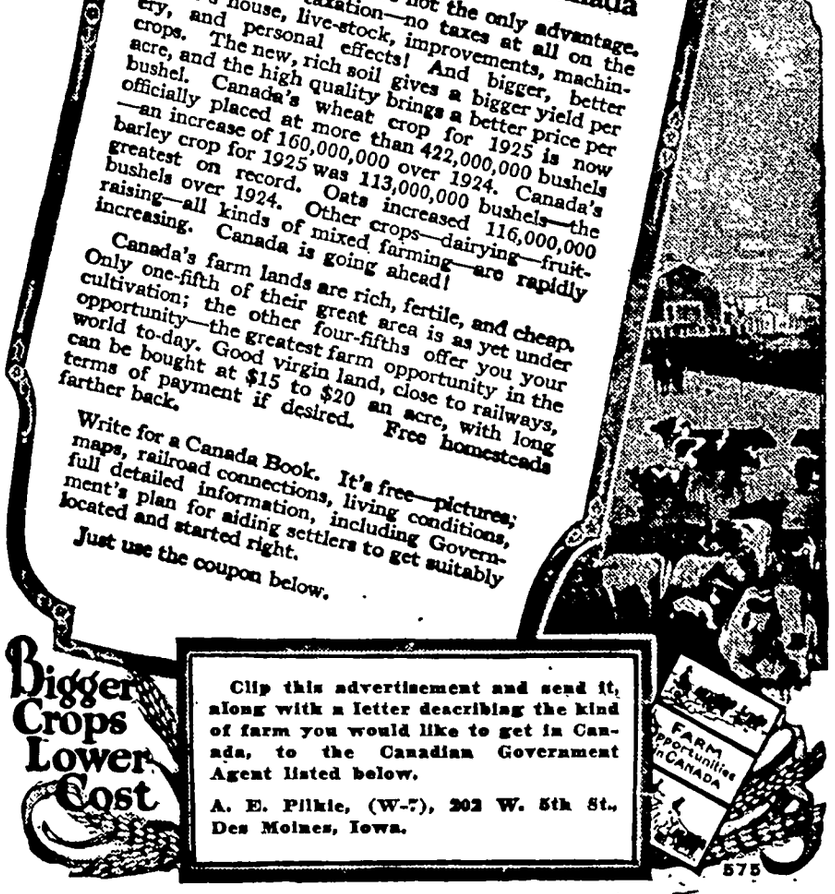
Every Advantage is With Canada

Lower freight rates are not the only advantage. There is lower taxation—no taxes at all on the farmer's house, live-stock, improvements, machinery, and personal effects! And bigger, better crops. The new, rich soil gives a bigger yield per acre, and the high quality brings a better price per bushel. Canada's wheat crop for 1925 is now officially placed at more than 422,000,000 bushels—an increase of 160,000,000 over 1924. Canada's barley crop for 1925 was 113,000,000 bushels—the greatest on record. Oats increased 116,000,000 bushels over 1924. Other crops—dairying—fruit-raising—all kinds of mixed farming—are rapidly increasing. Canada is going ahead!

Canada's farm lands are rich, fertile, and cheap. Only one-fifth of their great area is as yet under cultivation; the other four-fifths offer you your opportunity—the greatest farm opportunity in the world to-day. Good virgin land, close to railways, can be bought at $15 to $20 an acre, with long terms of payment if desired. Free homesteads farther back.

Write for a Canada Book. It's free—pictures; maps, railroad connections, living conditions, full detailed information, including Government's plan for aiding settlers to get suitably located and started right.

Just use the coupon below.



Clip this advertisement and send it, along with a letter describing the kind of farm you would like to get in Canada, to the Canadian Government Agent listed below.

HERE'S A SCHEME THAT LOOKS GOOD

Why Couldn't This Ranch Be Started In Klemme?

Small towns often wonder how a big industry could be started to put the town on the map and draw a lot of people to it. Here's ag cod idea that might be worked out here with the proper backing.

"To start with we shall collect say 1,000 000 cats Each cat will average twelve kittens a year. The skins run from ten cents for white ones to seventy-five cents for pure black This will give us 12,000,000 skins a year to sell at an average of thirty cents each, making our revenue about $10,000 a day gross.

"A man can skin fifty cats a day for $2.00. It will take one hundred men to operate the ranch, and therefore our net profit will be about $9,800 a day.

"We will feed the cats on rats, and start a rat ranch next door. The rats will multiply four times as fast as the cats If we start 1,000,000 rats we shall have four rats a day for each cat, which is plenty.

"Now then, we will feed the rats on the carcasses of cats from which the skins have been taken, giving each rat a fourth of a cat. It will thus be seen that the business will be self-acting and automatic all the way through The cats will eat the rats, the rats will eat the cats, and we will get the skins. Are you with us?"

HORNED RABBITS NO NOVELTY AT ALGONA

ALGONA, Feb. 4.—Killing a horned rabbit in this part of Iowa has ceased to be a novelty as bunnies with the wart-like black growth on their heads have been killed in every town and hamlet in this section. But William Miller, a 14 year old youth of this place, thinks he has a record breaker, having brought in a specimen with 11 good sized warts clustered around the rabbit's ears. It is conceded that the so-called "horns" are the result of some kind of skin disease that is prevalent this year. Many people who like rabbit meat are laying off this year as they are afraid to eat the meat.

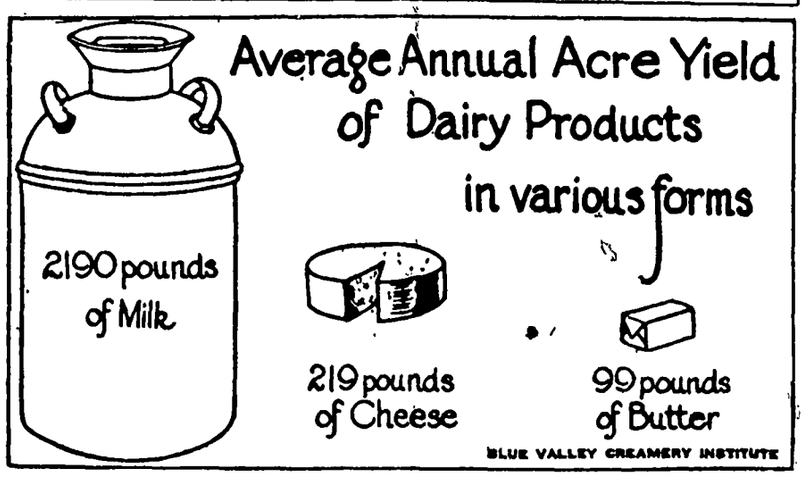
Cow Greatest Food Producer of Any Animal in the World



Average Annual Acre Yield of Dairy Products in various forms
2190 pounds of Milk
219 pounds of Cheese
99 pounds of Butter
BLUE VALLEY CREAMERY INSTITUTE

THE COW produces more human food per acre of feed than any other farm animal in the world, according to the Blue Valley Creamery Institute. This is largely responsible for the steady increase in the number of dairy cows in the United States, as compared with other classes of live stock. If the products of the American cow were consumed as fluid milk, an acre of ground would produce 2,190 pounds, which has the energy and heat-producing value of 711,800 calories and contains 72.3 pounds of digestible protein. If the products of the cow were consumed in the form of cheese, the acre yield would be only 219 pounds, having an acreage energy value of 247,000 calories and giving 56.7 pounds of digestible proteins. If consumed as butter, the acre yield would be 99 pounds, with an energy value of 355,000 calories and giving one pound of digestible protein. The skim milk is left for feeding to hogs and poultry, of course. Next to the dairy in acre returns is the hog. Far below the hog in economy production are poultry, beef cattle and sheep.

FIFTH FIRE THIS WINTER DESTROYS KLEMME HOTEL

Fire Broke Out Twice Within F. Hours, Second Fire Wipes It Out Of Existence

FIRE DISCOVERED BY MR. YOST

Klemme has had more fires within the past few months than the entire life of the town, some thirty years.

The residences were again awakened early Monday morning when the fire whistle soundd the alarm at about five o'clock when Mr. Yost, a roomer at the hotel, was awakened by the smell of smoke coming up the hallway of the hotel. He immediately awakened other sleepers and the alarm was turned in.

Despite the early hour the fire company made a quick run and were coupling up the hose a few minutes after the alarm was given. Smoke was pouring from the sides and roof of the frame building and the flame was hard to locate. By smashing cellar windows and chopping [illegible] in the floor and flooding the basement with water the fire was under control in about an hour and was thought to be put out. The floor joists and other timbers were burned off and the building was badly wrecked.

The dense smoke prevented from saving furniture other than that on the first floor and this was carried out of danger.

At about eleven o'clock smoke was again seen to issue from the side walls and up near the roof of the building and the alarm was again turned in and the fire company got on the job. They quickly smothered an interior fire but the flames seemed to be in the walls of the building and not to be reached as the floor inside was dangerous to walk on and in a few minutes the blaze broke out in several parts of the building and it was seen the building was beyond control and the fire company used precaution to protect nearby buildings by stringing out other lines of hose and kept the building soaked enough to prevent the fire from spreading.

The hotel lay a mass of ruins and charred timbers and was entirely consumed by the flames in a little over an hour

A. G. Koerner, owner of the building had it well insured, as were also the contents. Proprietor Harold Leitzinger managed to save their belongings. About half of the furniture and fixtures were lost, as well as personal belongings to some of the roomers.

Range Boiler Blew Up

Quite a scare was thrown into the crowd of a couple of hundred bystanders watching the blaze when a range boiler, in the kitchen of the burning building suddenly blew up with a loud cannon-like report and was shot hundreds of feet into the air, narrowly missing several persons when it crashed to the ground with terrific foce. The five foot-high boiler was sailed up so high in the air that it appeared to be about the size of a Ford muffler. When it came down it smashed itself flat and dug up about a foot of frozen dirt and ice.

We Thank You!

We wish to thank all for their prompt assistance at tho hotel fires Monday morning; and for all favors shown us in helping save goods. We want to thank the fire company for their quick appearance and good work at both calls.

A. G. Koerner,
Harold Leitzinger.

35 MEN KILLED IN THREE MINE BLASTS

Twenty-Seven Dead in Alabama—Five in Illinois—Three in Colorado.

Birmingham, Ala. — Twenty-seven miners, eleven white and sixteen negroes, were killed in an explosion at the Mossboro mine of the Premier Coal company near Helena. Fifty-three men were in the mine at the time of the blast, twenty-six of them escaping uninjured.

The disaster occurred at what miners call "shooting time." Each day when the miners are ready to quit work several "shots" are fired to loosen coal for the next day's work. One of these shots hit a pocket of gas and caused the explosion which claimed the heavy death toll and badly wrecked the mine.

Every effort was made to save the men in the lower levels. Oxygen was pumped into the mine and volunteer rescue crews, led by G. W. Postell, owner of the mine, and Charles Hines, foreman, rescued many who were unable to make their way to the mouth of the slope.

West Frankfort, Ill.—Safety measures were believed by mine officials to have saved more than 1,100 coal miners in a local gas explosion at the new Orient mine here. Five men were killed.

The explosion was the first to occur in the mine, which is one of the largest and most modernly equipped in the world. It was planned throughout with a view to safety before the first breaking of ground. At strategic points in the workings rock dust is placed on platforms easily tilted by the slightest rush of air from an explosion. The shale dust is also scattered on the floors, keeping the explosive coal dust from getting into the air.

Only three men, besides those killed, were working in the immediate vicinity of the explosion which was confined to a small section about 500 feet below the surface. They escaped with slight injury.

The bodies of the victims were recovered and identified by their check numbers as Arlie Sanders, Elijah Hindman and Floyd Kern, all of Benton, and Jerry Roach and Ed Cobert of West Frankfort. All were burned beyond recognition.

Trinidad, Colo.—A gas explosion in mine No. 3 of the Bear Canon Coal company, 25 miles northwest of here, killed three men, but 33 miners escaped. The survivors all were burned and seared, five seriously. A gas pocket is believed to have caused the explosion.

Rail Employees Will Demand Pay Increase

New York.—Railway conductors and trainmen on all the lines in the country will file applications for pay increases to the scale fixed by the labor board in 1920, the peak of rail employees' wages, it was announced. President William G. Lee of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen and President L. E. Sheppard of the Order of Railway Conductors have sent orders to brotherhood officers of all lines to ask the 1920 scale.

A canvass of opinion among railway executives here brought the prediction that the demands would be rejected. The demands come on the eve of a report from the railroads of the largest year's earnings in history, a net income of $1,130,000,000 for 1925 being estimated. This is short by several millions, however, of the 5¾ per cent return on the Interstate Commerce commission property valuation, which is set by the transportation act as a fair return.

The increases for conductors, baggagemen, flagmen, brakemen and yardmen to be asked will range between $1 and $1.50 a day in most cases.

Two to Arms Conference; Senate Allows $50,000

All preparations for sending the delegation within the next few days are going ahead.

$60,000,000 LOPPED OFF REVENUE BILL

Senate Agrees on Enormous Annual Tax Reduction.

Washington.—Estimates place the annual tax reductions resulting from recent action of the senate at $60,000,000.

Clearing the revenue bill of noncontroversial provisions, the senate gave tentative approval to widespread tax reductions in the first reading of the measure.

Provisions approved by the house slashing the normal income tax rates, increasing the personal exemptions, and repealing many of the miscellaneous taxes, were accepted without debate. Although still subject to amendment, none of these rate schedules is expected to be opened again.

In accepting some amendments to the house bill proposed by the finance committee, the senate approved repeal of the capital stock tax.

Provisions accepted and over which no further controversy is expected by leaders included:

Reductions in the normal income tax rates from 2 to 1½ per cent on the first $4,000 of taxable income, 4 to 3 per cent on the next $4,000, and from 6 to 5 per cent on the remainder.

Increase from $10,000 to $20,000 in the amount on which the 25 per cent reduction for "earned income" may be applied.

Increase in the personal exemptions from $1,000 to $1,500 for single persons and from $2,500 to $3,500 for married persons.

Repeal of the taxes on automobile tires and parts, jewelry, cameras, photographic films and plates, firearms and ammunitions, smokers' articles, automatic slot machines, works of art, brokers, bowling alleys and billiard tables, shooting galleries and riding academies, automobiles for hire, tobacco manufacturers, deeds and conveyances.

While controverted provisions, on which the Democratic-Progressive coalition will center its fight, were passed over temporarily, progress made indicates the bill will be passed within two weeks.

MITCHELL RESIGNS AS ARMY OFFICER

Colonel Asks to Be Released —May Continue Fight.

Washington.—Col. William Mitchell has resigned from the army, and his resignation has been accepted.

He probably will go on the lecture platform to continue his campaign for greater development of aviation. It was as a part of this campaign that he made the public charges of maladministration which led to his court-martial conviction on charges of infringing military discipline. The sentence of five years' suspension pronounced by the court-martial had been approved by President Coolidge.

The resignation was sent to Brig. Gen. Samuel D. Rockenbach, commanding the district of Washington, who referred it without comment to the adjutant general of the army. The latter transmitted it to the war secretary's office. It merely said:

"I hereby tender my resignation as an officer of the United States army to take effect February 1, 1926."

Bahamas Fear Smallpox; Prohibit Florida Ships

Miami, Fla.—Smallpox, which recently assumed epidemic proportions in Tampa, has become prevalent on the Florida coast. In Miami alone health authorities admit there are many cases, while it is unofficially reported that numerous cases are scattered throughout towns and villages in the Florida keys between here and Key West.

Fear lest the disease be communicated to the Bahama islands has caused the British government to notify Lewis A. Bates, vice consul here, that pending further orders all communication between the Bahamas and Florida ports is prohibited.

PLANS FOR LEGION MEETING IN PARIS

Arrangements for holding the national convention of the American Legion in Paris, France, in 1927, on the tenth anniversary of the landing of the A. E. F. on French soil, were discussed in detail at national headquarters of the Legion at Indianapolis recently.

Among those participating in the conference were National Commander John R. McQuigg, Commandant Z. Peckoff, official representative of the French government, and John J. Wicker, Jr., and Bowman Elder, member of the American Legion France convention travel committee.

Commandant Peckoff, who was sent from France specially to assist in working out plans for the convention, bore an official letter of invitation from Premier Aristide Briand. The letter read in part:

"American soldiers of the Great war, conquerors of St. Mihiel, St. Quentin and Chateau-Thierry, will be very welcome on this sacred pilgrimage to the tombs of their brothers who died on the field of honor and are buried on French soil. . . . The necessary instructions have been given to the departments of the ministry concerned to study the various questions relative to the transportation of Legionnaires and their stay in France."

Mr. Wicker, who is chairman of the Legion committee arranging for the convention, was informed by Commandant Peckoff that a special bureau has been set up in the French foreign office to handle details of the convention. The commandant described glowingly the welling up of French enthusiasm at the "second coming of the A. E. F."

According to present plans, the Grand Palais on the Champs Elysees will be leased to the American government for $1 to make it American territory for the time so that the convention may be held in it. A 50 per cent reduction in bus and railroad fares has been granted for groups of Legionnaires from the port of embarkation to Paris and from Paris to the battlefields and cemeteries, according to information received by Chairman Wicker.

Mr. Wicker was told by the commandant that it will be mandatory for Legionnaires and auxiliary members planning to make the trip to make their reservations for the convention four months before the convention. Arrangements, it was explained, cannot be made after that date. French hotels and the city of Paris are co-operating in working out plans for housing the thousands of veterans who are expected to make the trip.

Savings clubs are being formed by Legionnaires all over the country in order to save the money necessary for the pilgrimage. Persons desiring to go must have been bona fide members of the Legion or the Legion auxiliary for both 1926 and 1927.

Post for Artists

The only American Legion post in existence whose membership is limited to artists was formed recently in the Chicago artists' colony. There were more than one hundred members before a charter was applied for. Morres Eckers Llepman, commander of the post, said the post has pledged itself to help disabled veterans who are being trained in commercial art by the veterans' bureau. A clubhouse has been rented where exhibits of post members' work will be held twice a year.

Otherwise Occupied

"If you must whistle," stormed the office boss, "whistle while I am out to lunch."

"But I can't then, sir," protested the office boy.

"Can't? Why can't you?"

Coat-Dress Has Strong Appeal; Smart Party Frocks of Taffeta

WHILE praise of the two-piece dress is being shouted from the housetops of fashionland the aristocratic one-piece tailleur, such as the picture shows, goes quietly and elegantly on in the tenor of its way. In fact, the coat street dress has not lost in prestige. Of course as an exponent of ultrasmartness it must be fashioned of cloth of first quality, displaying correct detailing of collar, cuffs and pockets. Especially this season does the mode exact of the one-piece tailleur that it be of high-grade material and exquisite finesse.

The one-piece model pictured here answers all the requisites of a patrician type. It is man-tailored of handsome gray luster twill. The front opening buttons so as to accent a cleverly manipulated inverted plait which, while it gives necessary fulness about the hemline, in no way detracts from the slenderized straight-line silhouette. Fashion dictates outin pockets for the mannish tailleur and here you have them. A charming feminine touch is bespoken in the vestee of flesh-colored satin.

Much might be said in regard to the new vogue for flesh and pale pink colored accessories to the tailored costume. Whereas once we chose white silk, crepe or satin collars, cuffs and vestees, the last word from Paris favors fascinating delicate pink tints.

Returning to the subject of the coat frock, favored materials for its interpretation include first of all hard-finished luster twills, the sort that always look spick and span and seem impervious to effects of dust and lint. The favor for gray in various degrees is amounting almost to a fad. It is said that gray fur neckpieces will be worn with these handsomely tailored one-piece street dresses. Beige also has its adherents.

A very patrician-looking coat-dress, one which will give eminent satisfaction from the standpoint of both utility and arresting appearance, is of covert cloth made in double-breasted fashion, featuring sleeves that full into a wrist band.

In what a capricious mood do we find fashion these days. Especially in the matter of party frocks and formal evening gowns, the mode has gone to extremes. Just as milady has been completely won over to the idea of dresses as narrow, as straight-line and as short as can possibly be, stylists suddenly throw upon the screen billowy full skirts, with bodices which somewhat mold to the figure, the entire ornate with lace flouncings and flower trimmings.

So here we are confronted with a study in contrasts—slender svelte modernistic frocks versus bouffant picturesque period gowns. Stylists invite you to take your choice.

When the imposing robe de style, with its yards and yards of material in the skirt first made its appearance this season it was not taken seriously, but now its acceptance as a reigning mode for evening has become a fact rather than a passing fancy. Another very charming interpretation of the full-skirted mode takes on the quaint expression of the 1830 frocks as well as those of Colonial days.

The lovely taffeta frock shown in the picture is without a doubt a strong argument in favor of the bouffant and the picturesque. The taffeta is changeable, its exquisite rose-lavender tones reflected in the handmade tinted silk flowers which together with beautiful lace adorn this picture frock.

By the way, a taffeta silk vogue is o'erspreading the realm of fashion. Quaint striped and plaided borderings, like grandmother's silks so elegantly flaunted, are very smart. Per example, the slim maiden of today is dancing in adorable frocks made of pastel colored taffeta, such as nile green, rose, lavender or periwinkle blue. These have full skirts which are gathered into almost a normal waist line, with rainbow borderings encircling the hemline. A draped collar, suggesting a fichu is made of the stripes.

Showing the Full-Skirted Mode.

O. K.'S WORLD COURT BY VOTE OF 76-17

Senate Rejects All Opposition Reservations—May Not Be Accepted.

Washington.—A nation-wide movement to take the United States out of the World court as well as to keep it from entering the League of Nations has been launched here.

Senator James A. Reed of Missouri took the initiative and probably will be directing head of the campaign, which will be carried into most of the states where senatorial elections are held in the fall.

Senator Reed issued a statement in which he declared cloture might be applied to the senate but not to the country. He served notice he intended to discuss the question of the court before the American people.

Berlin.—A few hours after the United States senate voted in favor of the United States' entrance into the World court, the German reichstag voted confidence in Dr. Hans Luther's second cabinet and its policy favoring Germany's entry into the League of Nations.

Geneva.—League officials believe the reservations adopted by the United States senate to safeguard the United States' membership in the World court may delay actual American participation in the court for years.

The members of the league secretariat are bewildered by the multitudinous reservations adopted in Washington. They are unable to state whether or not all the reservations will be acceptable.

It was explained that the reservation delaying American signature to the World court protocol until other signatories have accepted the senate reservations in writing will necessitate the United States engaging in private negotiations with 48 different nations. This might require years, it was said.

Any single nation, San Domingo or Liberia, for instance, might block American entry into the court.

Washington.—The senate adopted, by a vote of 76 to 17, the resolution providing for the adherence of the United States to the protocol under which the 55 countries in the League of Nations established the permanent Court of International Justice. With 93 senators voting, 62 were the two-thirds required for adoption of the resolution, and it was approved with 14 votes to spare.

The court measure was put over by a combination of 30 Republicans and 37 Democrats. The opposition consisted of 14 Republicans, 2 Democrats and 1 Farmer-Laborite.

The roll call which decided the issue follows:

For adherance—Republicans:
Bingham, Butler, Cameron, Capper, Couzens, Cummins, Curtis, Dale, Deneen, Edge, Ernst, Fess, Gillett, Goff, Gooding, Hale, Howell, Jones (Wash.), Keyes, Lenroot, McKinley, McLean, McMaster, McNary, Means, Metcalf, Norbeck, Norris, Oddie, Pepper, Phipps, Reed (Pa.), Sackett, Shortridge, Smoot, Stanfield, Wadsworth, Warren, Weller, Willis—40.

Democrats:
Ashurst, Bayard, Bratton, Broussard, Bruce, Caraway, Copeland, Edwards, Ferris, Fletcher, George, Gerry, Glass, Harris, Harrison, Heflin, Jones (N. M.), Kendrick, King, McKellar, Mayfield, Neely, Overman, Pittman, Robinson (Ark.), Ransdell, Sheppard, Simmons, Smith, Stephens, Swanson, Trammel, Tyson, Underwood, Walsh, Wheeler—36. Total—76.

Against adherence—Republicans:
Borah, Brookhart, Fernald, Frazier, Harreld, Johnson, La Follette, Moses, Nye, Pine, Robinson (Ind.), Schall, Watson, Williams—14.

Democrats:
Blease, Reed (Mo.)—2.

Farmer-Labor:
Shipstead—1. Total—17.

The three absentees were Senators Du Pont, Delaware, and Greene, Vermont, Republicans, and Dill, Democrat, Washington. It was announced that Senator Dill was paired against the court, with the other two absent senators for it.

The resolution was adopted in the revised form offered several days ago by Senator Swanson (Dem., Va.) after the Republican and Democratic leaders of the pro-court forces had made changes in the reservations to meet grounds of opposition. All reservations offered by the opposition were voted down overwhelmingly.

The favorable action of the senate brought joy to the White House, where, though the President himself made no comment for publication, the result was hailed a triumph for Mr. Coolidge.

At the State department it was said the League of Nations secretariat at Geneva would be notified of the desire of the United States to sign the World court protocol upon the conditions set forth in the reservations. The 55 nations adhering to the protocol then will signify formally whether they accept American adherence to the protocol on the conditions specified. It is not doubted that they will accept.

...cent number of T. P.'s and ...s Weekly, Prof. J. Arthur ...on—who is a kind of self-...ointed British pope of popular ...ence, and a very good one, too—...cidates the causes that make people's hair turn gray.

The subject was dealt with very successfully a number of years ago by Professor Poulton, the Oxford entomologist, in his book, "Animal Colouration," on which Professor Thomson is evidently basing his own ideas.

The story of the responsible bankers whose hair turned gray in a single week during times of crisis like the World war is probably quite true. Such cases are not uncommon in history. Marie Antoinette's hair, for example, is said to have turned white in a very short time as a result of emotional distress; and similar instances are recorded by a number of medieval writers.

The sudden change of color is due to the intrusion of little bubbles of gas into the substance of the hair, which ...flects the light and prevents the pigment, which is still present, from showing. When hair goes gray more slowly, ...is—or so Metchnikoff believed—due ...the officious activity of white corpuscles which have got into the bad ...t of prowling up into the hair and ...ouring the pigment.

Many fur-bearing animals change ...or with the weather, and the ...hanism involved in these changes ...ears to be very much like that ...h affects human hair.

Professor Nash, who has taken a leading part in research, when asked as to the significance of the d...coveries from the standpoint of industrial utilization of British coal resources, said he was only able to announce that the laboratory tests had demonstrated oil could be got from coal. The commercial exploitation he was not competent to discuss. The liquid products have not been investigated in detail, but apart from small proportions of unidentified substances they consist of hydro-carbons which are basis of all fuel oils. South Staffordshire coal gave 37 per cent of liquid, while a South Wales coal gave 26 per cent.

Cause Enough

A camel has its limit of endurance as the old saw concerning the ultimate straw and the broken back will testify. ...rs. North also had her limit, which ...finally reached when an argument, ...which little could be understood, ...ged with unabated fury for two ... in the Smith household next ...

Calling to Willie Smith, who was playing in the back yard, Mrs. North asked the seven-year-old shining light of the warring Smiths:

"What is all the row about, Willie?"

"Oh, mamma put her cushion on daddy's chair and he sat down on it," replied the small lad.

"Why, that is no cause for such an argument is it?"

"Sure it is! It was mamma's pin cushion!"

As Dad Sees It

"My boy," said the Billville father to his literary offspring, "this here so-called 'fire of genius,' is well enough in the lazy, dreamful summertime, but when the winter wind is rumbling in the hollows and cavortin' round the frosty hills, it can't hold a tallow candle to cordwood and hard coal. Here's a new ax that has never cut down a pine saplin', or a oak tree, and split 'em to kindling wood. Suppose you christen it, and make the chimney blaze? There's no better way to keep up your college athletic exercises. It beats an apple a day for downright good health and spirits. So roll up your sleeves and get busy."—Atlanta Constitution.

Viviant's Memory Prodigious

One of the sources of the late Rene Viviani's eloquence was his profound knowledge of French literature. He knew by heart thousands of verses and could recite entire acts of the classic tragedies without an error.

He demonstrated this at the time of his baccalaureate, when he agreeably surprised the examiner by his accurate analysis of "The Cid."

"Can you recite a few verses of it?" the examiner asked.

"Certainly," said Viviani, and had recited the whole of the first act before he was halted. On another occasion he recited the whole of "Horatius" and "Phedre" from beginning to end.

Ears That Tell Ages

To ascertain the age of a horse, if not too old, it is usual to examine its teeth. To tell the age of a fish, regardless of age, you look into its ear.

In the internal ear of a fish there is a little bony pocket. In this pocket is a tiny stone called an otholith, which rolls about as the fish tips this way and that, and so helps it to know if it is right side up. As the fish grows older, says a writer in English Mechanics, the otholith grows larger, and the age of the fish may be determined from its size.

French Literary Men Dispute Over Unicorn

Was there ever such an animal as the unicorn? Its existence has been testified to by no less authoritative writers than Aristotle and Pliny, and even in 1877 the members of the French academy, including the distinguished names of Renan and Victor Hugo, were so doubtful on the subject that in their dictionary they gave the ambiguous definition that, according to the most general opinion, the unicorn never existed. But the present members of the academy, still at work on the new edition of the famous dictionary, have tried to settle the question for once and all. The unicorn say the immortals, is a fabulous animal of antiquity.

The French press refuses to accept the dictum as final. Why, queries Andre Billy, a well-known writer, should the members of the academy, counting not a single naturalist in their ranks, be allowed to settle the question? And, in the century of radium and the wireless, why should we deny the testimony of Pliny and Aristotle on the existence of a beast remarkable only in that it had a horn on its forehead?—Paris Letter.

Human Ruminants Not Unknown to History

The first case of a human ruminant reported in a scientific journal was that of Robert Gill, a cobbler of Dorsetshire, whose death was reported in the British Annual Register under date of October 1, 1767.

In ancient times and in the Middle ages men who chewed the cud were apparently very far from rare, but modern science would be prone to dismiss such tales were they not supported by evidence of more recent time. Roger Gill died after suffering "great tortures" due to the loss of his strange faculty.

Gill usually began his second chewing a quarter or half an hour, sometimes later, after dinner, when every morsel came up successively sweeter and sweeter to the taste. The chewing continued about an hour or more, and sometimes would leave him for a little while, "in which case he would be sick at his stomach." Many other and later instances might be cited of men who have been "brother to the ox" in the possession of this faculty.—Chicago Journal.

Plow as Wedding Guest

The recent appearance of tractors has created great excitement in isolated villages of Turkestan, Central Asia.

The mullahs, or priests, are strongly opposed to the invention, which they call "shaitan omach," or "the devil's plow," and they utter dark prophecies of crop failures and other disasters that will follow its use; but the Turkestan peasants take kindly to the tractor after they realize its superiority over their primitive wooden, ox-drawn plows.

One case is reported in which a Turkestan peasant insisted that the tractor should be present at his marriage, as a sort of honored guest.

Snake Fares Well in Japan

While laborers were at work in the grounds of the imperial palace in Tokyo, they came across a live snake, so large that they first believed it was a log and started to move it. The reptile came to life and the workmen scattered. However, they could have done nothing anyway, as the court officials ordered that the crawler not be needlessly disturbed and they emphatically declared there would be no snake hunt. The snake, Japanese believe, is the spirit of the ancient fortress that was once on the site where it was found, and if let alone will harm no one.

The Navajo

The leading tribe of the southern division of the Athapascan stock of North American Indians was the Navajo or Tennai, which was the name used by themselves. Since first known they have occupied the land on and south of the San Juan river, in northern New Mexico and Arizona, and extending into the states of Colorado and Utah. They were surrounded on all sides by the cognate Apache tribes, except on the north, where they met the tribes of the Schoshonean family. At present the Navajo are on the reservation bearing their name in Utah, New Mexico and Arizona.

Farmers everywhere are now salting and smoking their meat AT THE SAME TIME with "Old Hickory Smoked Salt—the salt that's smoked with hickory wood smoke.

The smoke is on the salt, and pentrates through the fresh meat readily during cure, giving the meat an appetizing flavor and keeping qualities that could nèver be obtained with the old smoke-house methods—and with ONE HALF THE WORK.

Old Hickory Smoked Salt is simple to use. Just use it instead of ordinary salt in your curing formula. Then when your meat is ready to come out of the salt, the job is done. No fires to tend, less work, less truoble, less risk due to warm days.

No wonder farmers everywhere are giving up the old smoke house method after once using Old Hickory Smoked Salt!

New Egg-Drying Process

Chemical advance has now developed a process, already in commercial use, whereby large numbers of eggs can be kept for indefinite periods without the use of cold storage or preservatives, and which, it is said, will have a material effect upon the seasonal egg markets of the country. The new process produces perfectly dried eggs in the form of a powder. They will keep indefinitely and can be used for almost any form of cooking.

One day, at the table of the late Mr. Pease (dean of Ely), just as the cloth was being removed, the subject of discourse happened to be that of an extraordinary mortality amongst lawyers. The dean, who was quite deaf, rose as his friend finished his remarks, and gave the company grace: "For this and every other mercy, the Lord's holy name be praised."—London Answer.

She was late and made haste to slip into a fresh dress, brushing her hair, powdering her creamy skin with her usual gentle care. She was very quiet during dinner, and Prudence's eyes rested upon her often with troubled, unobtrusive sympathy. And after dinner, while her father read the evening paper, and while Prudence worked with an absurd bit of lace that was becoming a handkerchief to correspond with Jerry's newest gown, she sat in a great chair under a shaded lamp, a magazine upon her lap, and stared across it to the delicate pattern of the oriental rug. Jerry was considering how to surrender the broken toy.

The sudden ringing of the doorbell caused her to start violently, although she laughed immediately at the absurdity of her nervous tension. And when Katie came into the room and said in an awed voice:

"It's a policeman, and he wants to see Miss Harmer," Jerry was only amused—curious but not concerned.

"You've been speeding, miss, and you pay your own fines," said Jerrold. "Bring him in, Katie."

"Speeding! Good heavens, I crawled at a snail's pace," she denied lightly. And added slowly, "most of the time," as she remembered the burst of speed with which she left Locust street.

With the usual easy clubbiness of the small town and the Middle West, Jerrold asked the officer, whom he had seen and knew by name, to sit down, and offered him a cigar.

"This is my daughter," he said pleasantly, indicating Jerry in the great chair. "You wanted to see her?"

"Yes, if you don't mind," the officer began. "There was an accident downtown today, and if the chap dies Miss Harmer may be needed as a witness. Whether he dies or not, he may bring suit, and then—"

"Why, I didn't see any accident," protested Jerry in some surprise. "Everyone was driving carefully because of the ice. I came through town, but I didn't even see a flat tire."

The officer looked in his note-book. "Man run over. A fellow named Grilton drove the car that did the damage; we've got him locked up, waiting to see if the man dies. Now he says he saw you right beside him, a little in front. He says he has seen you often, knows you, knows your car, and—"

"Oh, I assure you I saw nothing," Jerry denied quietly.

"He swears the chap stood beside your car, his foot on the running board, talking to you, and that you started off in a great rush—"

Jerry did not move, did not speak, sat as one turned to ice.

Prudence got up quickly, crossed to her chair, sitting down lightly upon the great arm of it, her firm, soft fingers lying against Jerry's frozen hand. Jerry tried to smile at her, to nod reassurance. The attempt wrung her mother's heart.

The officer, unnoticing, had continued his narrative. "Started off very fast, with a great jerk, and swung the fellow back so he slipped on the ice. And Grilton was right behind you and ran over him before he knew he had fallen. Of course, if the fellow was bothering you, Miss Harmer—" he suggested, with the solicitous interest of an officer in a small city where her father was a man of power.

"He was not bothering my daughter, I assure you," Prudence interrupted softly. "The young man is a great friend of ours, a very particular friend. Nothing he could do would annoy my daughter in any way."

Jerrold came quickly to her assistance, enlightened by Prudence's defense, his less agile imagination having followed through the situation more slowly.

"My daughter drives fast, as you probably know, but she is a good driver and a careful one. She did not know there had been an accident. If she is in any way to blame, you may rest assured we shall not shirk our responsibility."

"Of course, of course; I just wanted to see if she would back up Grilton's story—"

Jerry nodded her head.

"Oh, yes," Jerrold went on quickly. "The man you mention, Mr. Allerton, I believe, did speak to her beside the car, and my daughter, in a great hurry to get home, started off very fast. She did not know he had fallen. She is naturally very much upset over the whole thing. She is simply horrified, as you see. Can't you wait until tomorrow, to give her a chance to—to recover—"

"Oh, my dear sir, we're not blaming Miss Harmer. It was this fellow Grilton did it. And of course the other chap—what's his name"—he consulted the note-book—"Allerton—he may not die anyhow, and—"

Jerry winced pitifully.

"Tell us—" Prudence hesitated to ask, fearing the effect upon Jerry, who clung to her hand. "He is hurt—how seriously?"

"Oh, you can't tell yet. They've got him up at St. Joseph's. There may be internal injuries, can't tell yet. Now, don't you be upset about it, Miss Harmer, nobody's blaming you. But if he should happen to die, you see, you'll have to testify at the inquest and it'll be up to the state to prosecute."

Jerry was a stony, graven image, and Jerrold hurriedly got the officer out of the room and away, and then came back and stood beside Jerry on the other side from Prudence, two stalwart bulwarks of love and pity. Jerry looked up at them and smiled.

"Mother," she said, "I love him—I loved him all the time."

"Yes, I know, sweetness." Prudence was brooding tenderness itself. "Get the car, Jerrold and ask Katie to bring our coats."

"He—he kissed me, and he was—drunk, mother. I thought he felt—just as I did—and he was only—drunk. I don't even know if he remembers—that he kissed me."

Katie came in with their coats, and at a sign from Prudence went out at once, leaving her alone with her daughter. Jerry stood up, and her mother put the great fur cloak about her shoulders very gently. Jerry did not know that she was trembling.

"You wouldn't feel—nice about it, mother—to know it was only that when you thought it was—something else."

"No, sweetness, I shouldn't like it."

Jerrold honked shrilly to them from the car outside the door, and with her hand in Prudence's, Jerry herself led the way. As they drove swiftly along toward the hospital, no word was spoken.

Jerry sat erect and motionless, staring upon the snow which the lights of the city sprinkled with scintillating gems.

When Jerrold, after first helping Prudence out, telling her to be careful, to mind the ice, not to fall, went back to assist Jerry, he said, a little awkwardly, but determined that she must have his view of things at last:

"Jerry, all men are fools sometimes. You shouldn't expect too much of any of us, you know—not all the time, at least."

Jerry nodded her head trying to smile her appreciation of his effort to help.

"There are a lot of fine things about him," he went on determinedly. "I—I had him stay up at the house with me while you were in Mount Mark."

"I know it, father."

Jerrold shook his head, vaguely puzzled. How women got on to things the way they did there was no knowing. He had covered all his tracks so carefully.

"That is why I looked at you that night at the station," she said in a

"Jerry," He Said, "You've Got to Admit It Was Treating Me Pretty Badly."

subdued little voice. "To see if you had anything against him."

"Not a thing," he declared, "not a thing in the world. I like him."

"I know it," whispered Jerry.

CHAPTER XI

How Jerry Loved

Even hospital rules and regulations give way to reason and romance in times of bitter stress, and it took Jerrold no more than three minutes to have all the red tape of St. Joseph's crooked about his little finger. And then they were taken, very quickly, very quietly, to a little white room where Duane lay and waited for Jerry.

There was a nurse in the room, but at a sign from the one who brought them, she went out, quickly, smiling back over her shoulder. Duane lay very still on the white bed. His eyes were closed. The olive tan of his skin was ivory white.

Prudence and Jerrold stood back, softly, and Jerry walked before them into the room, moving as one in a dream, her great, shadowy eyes fastened almost hypnotically upon the white face on the pillow.

He opened his eyes and a warm brightness flashed into them when he saw Jerry beside him. He smiled—that whimsical, tender smile whose gay effrontery had charmed and stirred her from the first.

"Jerry," he said, and the tender voice was weak, "you've got to admit it was treating me pretty badly."

He looked up at her, not smiling now. And Jerry stood over him, her eyes melting into his, agonizingly intense. Suddenly she wilted. Tears rushed into her eyes, the proud little chin drooped and quivered. She turned, a crushed and broken figure, toward her mother, even in that hour of its renunciation the tender dream of her youth dying hard within her, and cried despairingly:

"I can't help it! Maybe it is a different kind—the feeling is just the same."

She dropped on her knees beside the bed, the pain in her face, the shadow in her eyes, yielding to a joyous radiance as she pressed her lips against his shoulder.

CHAPTER XII

Of Dreams Come True

Jerry's surrender was as complete as her resistance had been. Regardless of the admonitions of the nurse and the restrictions of the hospital; regardless of the presence of her father and mother, who tried studiously to keep their eyes away from her, she hung over Duane, on her knees beside the white bed, kissed him, caressed his face, weeping bitterly. It was Duane himself, with his usual facetious, kindly courtesy, who intervened once in a while to stem the tide of her tumultuous emotions.

"Now, Jerry," he said, taking advantage of a slight subdual of her tears, "you'll have to marry me. You've kissed me and encouraged me and made love to me before witnesses."

Jerry laughed tearfully. "All right, I will," she said tremulously, yet gladly. "And just as soon as you like! Tomorrow, if you say so."

Prudence and Jerrold turned to them then anxiously, and Duane's eyes searched their pleading faces. He drew Jerry closer in his arm.

"This Prudence of yours told me," he said, with a tender smile to apologize for his use of that sacred name, "she told me that if that first warm wakening up stops short on better acquaintance, it is nothing. But if it goes on and on it is love at first sight. Let's wait a little, Jerry, and give ours a chance to go on and on. Just a little!"

Prudence's slender figure, which had stiffened into anxious rigidity at Jerry's impulsive offer, relaxed softly, and tears of grateful pleasure came to her eyes.

Jerry drooped contentedly against his arm, crooning her happiness. A curious, calculating look took the place of the tender brilliance of her eyes.

"Unless father especially needs you at the factory," she said, carefully wording her delicate thoughts, "you can be a great help to me in my building. And I know enough about it now so that we can easily make a good living for—both of us." An exquisite flush suffused her face.

Duane and Jerrold exchanged electrical, questioning glances. After all, Jerry was still very greatly in the dark about many things. Jerrold, with his unfailing generosity, stepped into the breach.

"A good idea, Jerry," he said. "I can't say I consider Duane particularly born under a mechanical star. You shall have him. At a great sacrifice on my part, of course. But I can only tell you in fairness that your young man will not be financially dependent on you and your houses. He had enough left out of the wreckage to tide him over, and he thinks of going into Iowa real estate on his own account. Your interests will dovetail very neatly along that line, won't they?"

Jerrold flushed with pleasure over the warmth of admiration for his effort that he met in the eyes of Duane and of Prudence, who whispered proudly that she couldn't have done it better herself. But Jerry turned great, questioning eyes upon Duane.

"Then you were not—completely—ruined, as the papers said?"

"Not—completely."

"Then why did you come here?"

Duane laughed, held her to him, kissed her hair.

"Then after all you really did—a little—" she began eagerly, unable to voice the hope that was almost a prayer within her heart.

"Oh, Jerry, a very great deal," he whispered.

* * * * * * *

Jerry felt she could not possibly know a greater happiness than she felt in showing Duane her houses a few weeks later when he was out of the hospital and quite himself again. Under his interest, his admiration, his unbounded pride in her accomplishment, she glowed with a glad delight.

"It isn't really the work," she explained, leaning back against the banister of a circular staircase which had cost her two hundred dollars more than her figures had allowed. "It is just like play, with something to show for it besides. Two things to show for it—a sweet little place for someone to live and set an example to the neighborhood, in the first place." She paused impressively.

"And in the second place," Duane encouraged her, reaching almost as by habit for her eager expressive young hands, his eyes feasting upon the radiance of her beauty.

"And in the second place, the bank account of Fairy Geraldine Harmer!"

"Do you know what is going to sound the sweetest thing in the world one of these days?" he asked very softly, very soberly, drawing her to him. He whispered the rest. "Jerry Allerton."

Now and Then, Not Often, Jerry Talked to Duane of Art.

Jerry flushed deeply, and her brilliant eyes gave him a dazzling glance beneath the cloudy lashes.

"Come quickly, and see the rest of the house," she begged.

* * * * * * *

There were other brooding, harassed, middle western fathers who foresaw ill results for the entire prairie land in Jerry's joyous romance. It was Irvin Weatherby who voiced this fear to Jerrold.

"I'm surprised you'd permit such a thing," he said plaintively. "You're setting a bad example for all the girls in town. You ought to talk to Jerry."

Jerrold did not understand.

"Why, they'll all be setting off to New York to study Art," he protested. "The town's full of it. Every place you go they talk of nothing else—Art, Art, Art—and they're all dabbing at dishes and drawing figures on tablecloths and sprigging flowers on good mirrors. The place is alive with it."

"That's queer," said Jerry's father. "I can't say I ever noticed we had such a passion for Art among us."

"Well, I reckon they figure to do as Jerry did. She didn't bring home any Art to speak of, but she seems pretty well satisfied with what she did bring. And it's catching, Harmer, it's catching."

Now and then, not often, Jerry talked to Duane of Art. "Just once in a while," she said softly, as they sat together in the early evening, and looked out on the wide lawn with the springing grass of the early springtime, and the great maples just bursting into bud, "just once in a while, I'm sorry I proved such a failure. I wish I were really a painter—just once. I'd like to paint my Iowa—its great big maples, its ugly, stiff houses, the mud in its streets and the blanket of smoke from its soft coal—I'd paint it all, but I'd make it rose and gold, and everyone's dreams come true."

[THE END.]

Measuring Sleep

Persons differ very greatly in their mode of slumber. Some awaken at the slightest noise, while others are only aroused with difficulty. These differences have been carefully classified by scientists. When scientists speak of how "fast" a person sleeps they mean how deep is his sleep. Not only is it possible to measure sleep, but there are different means of doing so. One method is by dropping a steel ball. The ball is dropped at increasing distances—four, six, eight, ten, twelve inches, and so on—until the sleeper becomes conscious of the sound and awakens. In this way scientists can find out how "deep" was his sleep. Another method is to touch the sleeper with an electric wire, noting the intensity of the current used.

"But constipation is serious, Grace"

"Not so long ago I was like you—headaches a good deal of the time, sleeping badly, and the least bit of housework tired me out. My complexion too, was bad.

"Finally, I went to see Dr. Farman. He showed me that it was constipation that was back of my troubles. He said that it was a very serious thing because poisons from clogged waste matter were picked up by the blood and carried to every body organ. And if I didn't correct it in time I might become a victim of one of those terrible organic diseases.

"He made me drop laxatives altogether, changed my diet, and put me on Nujol. I don't think I've ever felt better. I sleep well, my headaches have disappeared, and you can see for yourself what an improvement there is in my skin. Nujol has done wonders for me."

Nujol Works Like Nature

Constipation is dangerous for anybody. Nujol is safe for everybody. It is neither a food nor a medicine. It does not gripe. It is gentle and natural in its action and is prescribed by leading medical authorities.

Nujol simply makes up for a deficiency—temporary or chronic—in the supply of natural lubricant in the intestines. It softens the waste matter and thus permits thorough and regular elimination without overtaxing the intestinal muscles.

Nujol can be taken for any length of time without ill effects. To insure internal cleanliness, it should be taken regularly, in accordance with the directions on each bottle. As Nujol is not a laxative, it does not form a habit and can be discontinued at any time.

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 83

Mother! It's Cruel to "Physic" Your Child

To Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, it seemed cruel that so many constipated infants and children had to be kept constantly "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

While he knew that constipation was the cause of nearly all children's little ills, he did not believe that a sickening "purge" or "physic" was necessary.

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin he discovered a laxative which helps to establish natural bowel "regularity" even if the child is chronically constipated. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin not only causes a gentle, easy bowel movement, but, best of all, it never gripes, sickens or upsets the most delicate system. Besides, it is absolutely harmless, and so pleasant that even a cross, feverish, bilious, sick child gladly takes it.

When inclement weather makes it impossible to do much work on the exterior of your home is an excellent time to plan your repair and upkeep campaign. Go over your home thoroughly both on the interior and exterior, and make a complete list of all things that require repairs or renewal. In the event that you have been lax in the past in keeping your home in first-class condition you probably will find a number of things that will require attention. This system of checking up on your home well in advance of the time when it will be possible to do the work will be of great advantage in either planning to do the work yourself or in finding the proper mechanic at the least cost, and it will also provide time in which to accumulate the necessary funds.

That keeping a home in good repair will add many years to its life and much to its value is recognized by most home owners, yet it is surprising how many homes are allowed to become dilapidated by reason of neglect. The home usually represents a sizeable investment and to many the only one of any magnitude.

Those who have other investments will go to great lengths to protect them, yet they will at times slight the most important investment that they can ever make and allow their home to depreciate in value.

Any one owning a home should strive to keep it in as near its original condition as possible, which can be easily done by strict adherence to the rule of replacing or renewing any worn part in its earliest stages of wear.

Schools of Highest Importance to Town

There are certain quite definite requirements which the school building, equipment and grounds must meet if they are to promote the health of the school children.

The location of the schoolhouse is the first point to be considered. Unfortunately, there is only one time when deliberation can accomplish much in this respect, and that is before the schoolhouse is built.

Board of education building rules read: "The school site must be accessible, well drained, quiet, and safe."

Ordinarily, the schoolhouse should be not more than a mile and a half from the most distant home. This rule does not apply in rural districts.

A site should be chosen which provides generous space for playgrounds. The usual standard is that there should be from 50 to 200 square feet of playground per child.

The schoolhouse should be planned by a skilled architect who is familiar with the best standards of school construction. Lighting, heating, ventilating and fireproofing are the outstanding problems of hygienic construction. —Hygeia Magazine.

Pays to Remodel

"It is possible, by remodeling old houses, for the family of moderate means to own its own home, or even a country home in addition to its city apartment," says a bulletin from "Better Homes in America." The country house can even be had with profit, for it can be leased for short periods and be regarded as an investment rather than a liability and luxury.

"Finding such a home is not impossible, even within commuting distance of a large city, the only problem being to take time to find it, and to recognize the possibilities for improvements on old houses under unprepossessing conditions. Some of the most atrocious examples of mid-Victorian architecture and the most dilapidated old shanties may be made surprisingly attractive by the use of a little skill, ingenious thought and the removal of meaningless ornaments and partitions."

Better Cities

One encouraging thing about American life is the intense local parlotism of most citizens. Nearly every man you meet is always ready to defend his home city or town, and on occasion to do all he can to make it a better place.

Too often, however, we fail to have a good understanding of just what it takes to make a city a better place. Because it isn't simply a matter of getting more population, more factories, a new railroad or a deeper harbor.

It is something deeper—something that depends on the individual heart and conscience of the individual citizen. It can't be expressed in dollars or steel—few really worth-while things can; but it makes the difference between a city that is stifling to intellectual and moral development and one that isn't.—Logansport Pharos-Tribune.

Flowers on Lamp Posts

Appearance of streets in a Pennsylvania city has been improved by baskets for flowers and vines attached to the lamp posts, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. The plants are supported high enough above the pavement to be protected from vandals and do not obstruct the vision or interfere with the lights. Hundreds of these "hanging gardens" give some of the streets the appearance of well-kept parks.

A Little Bit Humorous

BOTH WRONG

A dispute arose between two old ladies as to the name of the music the band was playing. Said the first: "It's the Overture from 'The Mastersingers.'"

"Rubbish!" declared the second. "I should think I know the Prelude from 'Lohengrin' when I hear it."

As neither would give in, No. 1 consulted a notice board. "We're both wrong," she announced on returning. "It's 'Refrain From Spitting.'"

Shades of Webster!

Canada's Cattle

"Take the Cream"

LIVE stock breeders in Canada grow rich. The men who farm in your easily-reached neighbor country find every encouragement for raising high quality beef and dairy cattle.

At the great National Dairy Exposition at Indianapolis in October, 1925, the most coveted prize offered—first award for State Herd—was captured by Canadian Holsteins. The Senior and Grand Champion Female was a Canadian cow. Likewise, the Junior Champion Bull came from Canada. Of 24 animals entered by 10 Canadian breeders and shown against approximately 300 of the best dairy type animals produced in North America, 18 won individual prizes. The uniform high quality of the exhibit from Canada was conceded by all and was very generally commented upon.

Equally great are the opportunities in Canada for grain growing, mixed farming and fruit and poultry raising. Cheaper land, larger crops and bigger profits await you—along with a cordial welcome, and every facility for prosperous, independent life. Three hundred million acres of North America's richest agricultural land—virgin soil on which the best hard wheat in the world can be raised at lowest cost and marketed at highest prices!

This most productive land is fully served by railways. Freight rates are lower than in the States. Land taxes, too, are lighter. Good roads, markets, schools, and churches. Rural telephone service. Good neighbors, who probably include folks from your home district. Yet the cost is only $15 to $20 an acre—with long-term payments arranged, if desired. Farther back from the railroads, free homesteads, partially wooded, are still available within reasonable distances. In 1924 Americans took up 608 of these homesteads; during the period from January to November, 1925, Americans took up 657 homesteads in Canada.

If you are a farmer, or a young man eager to farm under ideal conditions, do not put this paper down until you write a letter to salaried officials of the Government of Canada who are at your service to assist you in moving and getting suitably located. Canada wants you and is willing to serve you. Act at once! 576

Hunters Care Little for Gnu's Ferocity

The gnu, with the head of a horse, the long, narrow face, the body of a horse, an antelope's legs, an upstanding mane and a flowing tail that reaches to the ground, is indeed a fantastic creature, writes Lillian Gish, in [illegible] voice, his pose—everything about him suggests fierceness. Though savage in captivity, he is extremely nervous, with a great regard for his own safety.

A herd of these gnus on the veldt is an alarming sight. Prancing and wheeling, and tossing their heads, they approach a strange object in single file, forming themselves into a solid square as they come near.

In this position they will stand for hours glaring at a tent set up on the plains, as though ready to tear it to pieces.

But this is a game of bluff. Let the occupier of the tent show himself with a gun and though they may gambol wildly around him, uttering loud snorts, it will be in ever-widening circles.

The first shot sends them flying, and so great is their speed that they vanish within a few seconds.

d's Mother Love Example of Heroism

A boy who "stood on the burning deck whence all but he had fled," has been immortality of a well-known poem; probably a certain skylark and her poet, although she deserves one.

During a field fire at Feltham, Middlesex, firemen noticed a hen sitting on her nest on the ground, in the direct path of the flames. The bird continued to sit on her eggs with dense smoke rolling over her, and even when the flames licked the grass of which the nest was constructed she did not stir until the firemen were close upon her.

So struck were the men with the heroism and devotion that they determined to save her home at all costs. They set about isolating the nest, and were so successful that, although the fire spread all around, the nest was scarcely damaged and the eggs remained intact.—London Tit-Bits.

Grief in Animals

A man or woman who loses some dear one is overcome with deep sorrow, remembering only the admirable qualities of the lost one, but this feeling is soon softened by a multitude of external impressions and influences, so that sorrow gives way to melancholy, which in its turn diminishes.

Not so in the case of many animals. These not only retain their grief much longer, but there are cases in which it lasts as long as life itself.

The cat will swim after her kittens which some cruel man is trying to drown. The story of the dog who starves to death on the grave of his master is no fable. A stone in the Paris dogs' cemetery is thus inscribed: "He was so intelligent that he might have been taken for a human being—but that he was faithful."—Das Neue Ullstein Magazin, Berlin.

Lighting Scheme

Speaking of modern conveniences and innovations, somebody who helped design the new infants' ward at the Children's hospital, St. Antoine and Farnsworth streets, used his or her imagination. About knee-high above the floor are recesses or slits in the walls fitted with lights. When a nurse enters during the night to tuck the babies in, she doesn't have to turn on the overhead lights and run the chance of waking the tiny patients up. The low wall-lights furnish her enough illumination to do her work without disturbing the babies. Out-of-town visitors have commented more on this little arrangement than on more important features of this great institution.—Detroit Free Press.

Only One Wood for Spools

In almost the entire world, with its great variety of wood to select from, there is only one kind that is used for spools—the ordinary spools on which sewing thread is wound, writes Charles N. Lurie in St. Nicholas. By far the greatest part of the world's spools are turned from the wood of the white birch tree. It grows in many sections of the United States, but especially well in Maine. Virtually the whole world's supply comes from the great north woods. Some of the spools are made in Maine, but a very large part of the wood is shipped elsewhere for spool-making, after being seasoned where it grows.

Where God Is

Eddie, age four, is a veritable question mark.

After attending Sunday school he was at home, seated on the floor playing with his sister, Virginia.

He looked up suddenly and asked: "Mamma, where is God?"

"God is everywhere," I answered.

Eddie held out his hand about twelve inches above the floor.

"Is God here, mamma?" he questioned.

I replied in the affirmative.

Then again from Eddie, still holding out his hand, "Come here, Virginia, and put your hand on God."

KLEMME CREAMERY HAD GOOD BUSINESS IN '25

ANNUAL CREAMERY MEETING AT THEATRE YESTERDAY

CREAMERY COMPLTES A VERY SUCCESSFUL YEAR

Many New Improvements Were Installed This Past Year

BEST PLANT IN NORTH IOWA

The officers and shareholders of the Klemme Co-Operative Creamery Company held their annual meeting at the Idle Hour Theatre yesterday afternoon, February 10th. The reports of the past year's business, as read by the Secretary, Valentine Josten and Treasurer, J. E. Stille, were very satisfactory, especially when t le considered that business conditions this past year were not ideal due to the bank failure, from which the creamery suffered to a small extent. But the Creamery has, nevertheless, enjoyed a very good year, and business will soon be back to normal and back to the former good basis.

The Klemme Co-Operative Creamery feels very grateful and thankful to their patrons because the large shipments of butter to Jersey City is a standing proof of heir loyalty to the Creamery. We would urge the farmers and friends of this home institution to continue to give the creamery your business and good will during the coming year and by so doing you will be rewarded with satisfactory prices for your products.

The Creamery has been working under more than ordinary hardships this past yeor, as they have had to enlage the plant and install a lot of new machinery to take care of pasteurizing. This has meant quite an expenditure. They can prorato money they had to spend last year for improvements to your cream checks this coming year.

The Creamery assures the very best of management and courteous treatment by the buttermaker and he Creamery board his coming year

The indications point to a very prosperous year ahead. The success of the Creamery rests entirely through the co-operation between the patrons, the buttermaker and the board. All mus do their part to insure success.

The Klemme Creamery is one of the best plants in Northern Iowa, both as to equipment, for volume of business and high prices paid for butterfat. The success of our local creamery is not entirely due to any one individual, but the success must be given credit to the patrons who co-operate to furnish the fine cream received; the buttermaker, Mr. A. D. Gimer does his part by understanding how to make high grade butter; his assistant must also be well trained to carry out his instructions; the board of direcors and the secretary, Mr. Valentine Josten, are also doing all in their power to co-operate with the patrons in keeping the wheels of this home concern turning toward prosperity for all.

Officers And Board Elected

An election of officers and board of directors was also held in connection with the business meeting. Herman Stromer was elected President; W. H. Groimann, Vice-President; Valentine Josten, Secretary; and J. E. Stille, Treasurer.

William Lemke was chosen director for the Southwest District, and Lippo Blank was elected director for the Southeast District.

C. E. Behnke Gives Talk

Mr. C. E. Behnke, of Ames, one of the most prominent men in the state in co-operative creamery work, gave a very interesting talk on butter. He pointed out the evils of clemargarine on the market in competition with creamery butter and told how to combat the menance. His remedy is to put a strong, nation-wide advertising campaign back of butter and create a larger demand for this product.

Meeting Well Aattended

The meeting was well attended and was a great success from every angle.

A statement of the past year's business will be found at the bottom corner of his page. Look it over.

A century ago, American sheep produced only an average of about 2 pounds of wool each year. Today the average sheep in this country produces 7½ pounds of wool annually. The increase of more than 300 percent is due largely to the use of better sires and culling.

The Farm Bureau Ladies of Ell Township held their first meeting to take up the study in Home Furnishing, which was held at the home of Mrs. Wm. Hampel on Tuesday Feb. 9th, and was an all day meeting The meeting was held under the leadership of Miss Merle Ranier, of Ames.

Save Glass Grocery Store Jars

Save the glass jars that come from the grocery stores, suggests the Home Economics Division of Iowa State College. These may be made into spice containers by punching small holes in the tops. This saves necessity of removing the lid except to fill the jar. The labels, when shellaced on, will not be removed by washing.

Onions are said to be a good source of vitamins B and C and a fair source of calcium. Hence, they should be included frequently in children's diet.

DOINGS OF THE WEEK REPORTED BY THE LOCAL SCHOOL

METHODIST CHURCH NOTES

A. W. Gauger, Pastor

Several weeks ago we called your attention to two great gatherings to be held. One of these has been held in Des Moines. The other will be held in Algona, on Wednesday, February 17. A great educational inspirational program has been built for this meeting. The meeting begins at 9:30 in the morning and lasts through the day and evening. This gathering is open to all with an especial invitation to the official family of every congregation.

Bishop Keeney will be present and preside at the meeting. His leadership in all of these matters is a source of gratitude to us all. He will be assisted in the day by such able men as:

Dr. W. B. Hollingshead, of Chicago,
Dr. Bert E. Smith of the Board of Sunday Schools,
Dr. Raymond V. Johnson of the Board of Prohibition and Morals,
Dr. T. E. Newland of the Board of Hospitals and Homes,
Dr. Frank E. Mossman of Morningside College,
Dr. G. T. Notson of our Conference Hospital,
Dr. M. P. Arrasmith, Superintendent of the Sheldon District,
Dr. T. S. Bassett of the Sioux City District,
Dr. E. C. McDade of the Fort Dodge District.

We hope that many will set this day aside for this very purpose and drive to Algona next Wednesday. It will surely be worth your while.

We are glad to note that our S. S. fully recovered itself and even surpassed our winter high mark last Sunday. During the icy roads and walks we had slipped down several degrees. The Liberty S. S. likewise roached the high mark last Sunday. Let all interested there help to run this high mark still higher.

The Pastor's subject for the morning service is: "Is the Church functioning properly?" or "Is the church fulfilling her mission?" We hear yes—no! for an answer. Let us see.

"Stopping before reaching Canaan" is our subject for the evening sermon. Both subjects are chosen advisedly and with a view of helping our audience and the community.

The Ladies Aid meets this Thursday at the Parish House with Mesdames R. A. Jorgenson and J. W. Waterman as hostesses. A full attendance is anticipated.

ICE MAN DOOMED

Electric refrigerators already installed are costing the icemen of the United States $10,000,000 a year, and if their installations continue at the present rate, they will be cosing he icemen not less than $70,000,000 by 19230, according to the report of a special committee made at a recent convention of the National Association of Ice Industries.

It is estimated, said the committee, that there are already in service in homes and sores approximately 200,000 electric refrigerators, and that additional units are being added at a rate of about 300,000 a year.

There are now in the country around fourteen million homes equipped for electric service, each of which is a potential user of an electric refrigerator. There are in addition stores in which large numbers of electric refrigerators are being installed.

A report of the convention says that seveal leading ice manufacturing companies contemplate undertaking the sale of electrical refrigerators as measure of self protection.

COUNTY DECLAMATORY CONTEST AT BRITT WED. NIGHT

Klemme High School Will Send Two First Place Winners

Our contestants are being aided aided these days by Miss Stoner, who is hearing them frequently in preparation for the County Declamatory Contest at Britt on Wednesday night of next week. We hope it may be possible for several to go over from here on that date and boost for our young declaimers. Myrtle Irving and Beatrice Busch will represent us and we hope they may win for us one of the silver loving cups to be awarded the victorious school.

Richard Axe will accompany the girls to Belmond the week following to represent us at the Preliminary State Contest. We shall be co[illegible]ing against Kanawha again, [illegible] Belmond and Clarion. The dat[illegible] the first state contest has been [illegible] for February 26th, but as both Kanawha and Klemme are scheduled to play their initial game of the County Basket Ball Tournament at Britt on the same date we hope to get permission to shift the date ahead an evening or two, in order that both contests may be attended by the largest possible delegation from each Klemme and Kanawha.

Lost To Rowan By One Point

Our Basket Ball Team were not in usual form at Rowan Tuesday night. They lost by just one point after leading most of the game. A low ceiling and a small gym were handicaps. The question of our success at the county tournament will depend a great deal on the physical condition of our boys. They will be in fast company at Britt and should see to it hat they enter the tournament in the pink of condition. Supt. Cooper has assured us that our initial game will be played on Friday night, Feb. 26th in order that no team will need to play three games on Saturday to win the tournament or play in the finals.

Some Parents Have Responded To School Nure's Suggestions

We find on checking up that quite a few of our parents have acted upon the suggestions given by [illegible] nurse employed by our P. T. A. for which we are glad. Some have b[illegible] to dentists, others to doctors, and several have reported that mothers were giving attention to their diet, especially when pupils were over or under weight.

We regret not more have responded Much of the failure to see a dentist has been, no doubt, due to there being no dentist in Klemme. We wonder, too, if all appreciate the relation of health to the condition of the teeth Many of the ills today are traceable to decayed teeth. Many of our parents are wise to the fact that baby teeth frequently need attention and are having them filled and cared for.

Stamp Seal Money Received

Our share from the stamp sale, Christmas seal stamps, has been received from Mrs. Schneider of Goodell. It was $12.50, enough to more than pay for our First Aid cabinet.

Klemme Wins From Swaledale

We should have mentioned earlier that our basket ball team won against Swaledale last Friday night by a score of 33 to 11.

Will Play Ventura Friday Night

They will play Ventura at Ventura on next Friday evening. Most of Klemme, will of course, go. We have just got to win this game in order to end the week well.

DOUBLE AIR FLEET IS NEW NAVY PLAN

Program in Congress Provides for $250,000,000 During Next Five Years.

Washington.—A $250,000,000 program for the development of American naval aerial defenses, virtually constituting the administration's answer to the unpreparedness charges of Col. William A. Mitchell, was submitted to the house committee on naval affairs by Rear Admiral Moffett, chief of the navy bureau of aeronautics.

The program has the full approval of the navy high command. The money asked for is to be expended over a period of five years and provides for 1,248 first class fighting planes.

It would result in nearly doubling the number of combat planes. The navy at present has 638 fighting planes. The proposed additions would increase their number to 775 in 1927, 865 in 1928, 1,040 in 1929, 1,150 in 1930 and 1,248 in 1931.

Government spokesmen said frankly that it is intended as a reply to criticisms that navy aviation has been administered in a haphazard fashion and that there is no definite policy looking to the strengthening of the aerial defenses intrusted to the naval establishment.

Questions put to Admiral Moffett brought out that the $250,000,000 recommended did not include estimates of the money that would be needed for personnel.

The army appropriation bill aggregates $339,581,924 and provides for the retention of the army at its present average strength of 118,583 enlisted men and 11,749 commissioned officers. Curtailment of other major activities is recommended.

An appropriation of $35,000,000 for army air service, while it provides among other features for the acquisition of 305 new airplanes during the fiscal year of 1927, will not add one plane to the present strength of that arm, it was pointed out. The new planes, the report reads, will simply replace equipment now obsolete or rapidly becoming so.

Slays Four, Fires Home, Burns Self to Death

Dowagiac, Mich.—Driven to an insane frenzy by days of brooding over the fact that his daughter was the mother of an illegitimate child, William Wilkinson, sixty-five-year-old farmer, killed his blind wife, his son, the daughter and the infant in their home near Dowagiac. He then set fire to the house and perished in the flames.

This is the only explanation offered by the authorities of Cass county following the discovery of the charred remains of the five persons in the ruins of the farmhouse. Wilkinson is known to have made threats to kill the daughter and himself.

The skulls of all the members of the family, except the farmer himself, had been crushed. The body of the child, a girl only three days old, was found beside that of Mrs. Alice Wilkinson, the sixty-year-old grandmother. Not far away were the remains of twenty-five-year-old Gineth Wilkinson, the unmarried mother, and her brother, Floyd, twenty-seven.

U. S. Dry Agents Sent to State Court for Trial

Washington. — Federal prohibition agents accused of murder while enforcing the liquor laws are entitled to trial in federal courts. They must, however, be prepared to show the killing was in line of duty if they would escape trial in state courts and they may not claim federal court protection from state indictments for perjury or conspiracy to obstruct justice in connection with their activities.

This is the gist of two opinions of the United States Supreme court delivered by Chief Justice Taft, which climax the clash of Maryland state authorities with a Baltimore federal district court over the right to try four prohibition agents indicted on November 19, 1924, by a county grand jury for the murder of Lawrence Wenger, an alleged moonshiner, in Harford county, Maryland.

Coolidge Is Not to Act in Mine Strike

Washington.—By a vote of 48 to 28 the senate refused to consider the Copeland resolution requesting President Coolidge to intervene in the anthracite suspension.

The senate's action was the first to be taken in congress in respect to the coal controversy, and the vote was forced by opponents of President Coolidge's nonintervention policy after many previous attempts for a showdown had been defeated in both senate and house.

TEMPERANCE BODY FAVORS WINE, BEER

Modify Volstead Act Is Plea, to Save Young People.

New York.—The Church Temperance society of the Episcopal church, for 51 years a leader in the cause of prohibition, it is announced, favors modification of the Volstead act to legalize the sale of light wines and beer.

The announcement was made through Rev. Dr. James Empringham, national secretary, formerly national vice president of the Anti-Saloon league.

A poll of the 20,000 members of the society, Doctor Empringham said, showed an overwhelming preponderance in favor of modification of the Volstead act.

In a report made by Mr. Empringham to a closed meeting of Episcopal clergy at the town hall he said that his society was now in favor of modifying the Volstead act:

"1. Because the effect of prohibition has been to put an end to scientific temperance teaching.

"2. It has discouraged the consumption of wine and beer and increased the demand for distilled liquors, which today are mostly poisonous.

"3. It has resulted in increased drinking among young people.

"4. It has brought about disrespect for all laws.

"5. It is class legislation, discriminating in favor of the rich.

"6. In our survey we found intemperance increased."

The survey referred to was one made by Empringham more than a year ago throughout the nation in an effort to prove that prohibition was a success. This survey, he told the assembled clergymen, showed him that on the contrary the prohibition laws had made the situation worse.

Some of the leaders of the Protestant Episcopal church expressed amazement at the announcement that the Church Temperance society had found that its membership was overwhelmingly in favor of modification of the Volstead act. They cast doubt on the accuracy of the questionnaire on which Rev. Dr. James Empringham based the announcement.

WORLD COURT WILL CUT U. S. EXPENSES

President Coolidge Cites Advantages to Country.

Washington.—Entrance of the United States into the world court and the League of Nations' disarmament conference will not, in the opinion of President Coolidge, endanger the national sovereignty of the United States.

But the entry of the United States will help to establish the peace of the world, reduce the expenditures of the United States for armaments, promote good will between nations, and thereby add to the national prosperity at the same time that it will promote national security, the President believes.

This view of the meaning of the steps taken to co-operate with Europe in the world court and disarmament bodies was outlined before the "business organization of the budget," by Mr Coolidge at a recent meeting. The meeting was attended by cabinet officers, department chiefs and thousands of government employees. The meeting was designed primarily to promote economies in government.

The President declared that any safeguards put around the peace of the world promote economy, provide financial stability and economic progress. The Washington disarmament conference was cited as the first step in this direction, the President holding that it not only afforded great financial relief by stopping the competition in naval armaments, but that it has promoted international good will and confidence.

He pointed to the League of Nations disarmament conference as holding the promise of a further advance in that field.

East's Death List 33 in Worst Storm of Years

New York.—The East is digging out from under its mantel of snow after one of the worst winter storms in years. The death toll for the gale area, extending from Georgia to New England, was placed at 33, while the property damage will run into the millions. It is estimated that it will cost New York city $2,200,000 to clear its streets, while many sections will be snow-bound for a week unless warm weather liberates them.

Boston's death list in the storm, the worst for a quarter of a century, was placed at five.

Eight were killed in a building collapse under the weight of snow at New Britain, Conn., eight perished at sea, and there were other deaths in various cities.

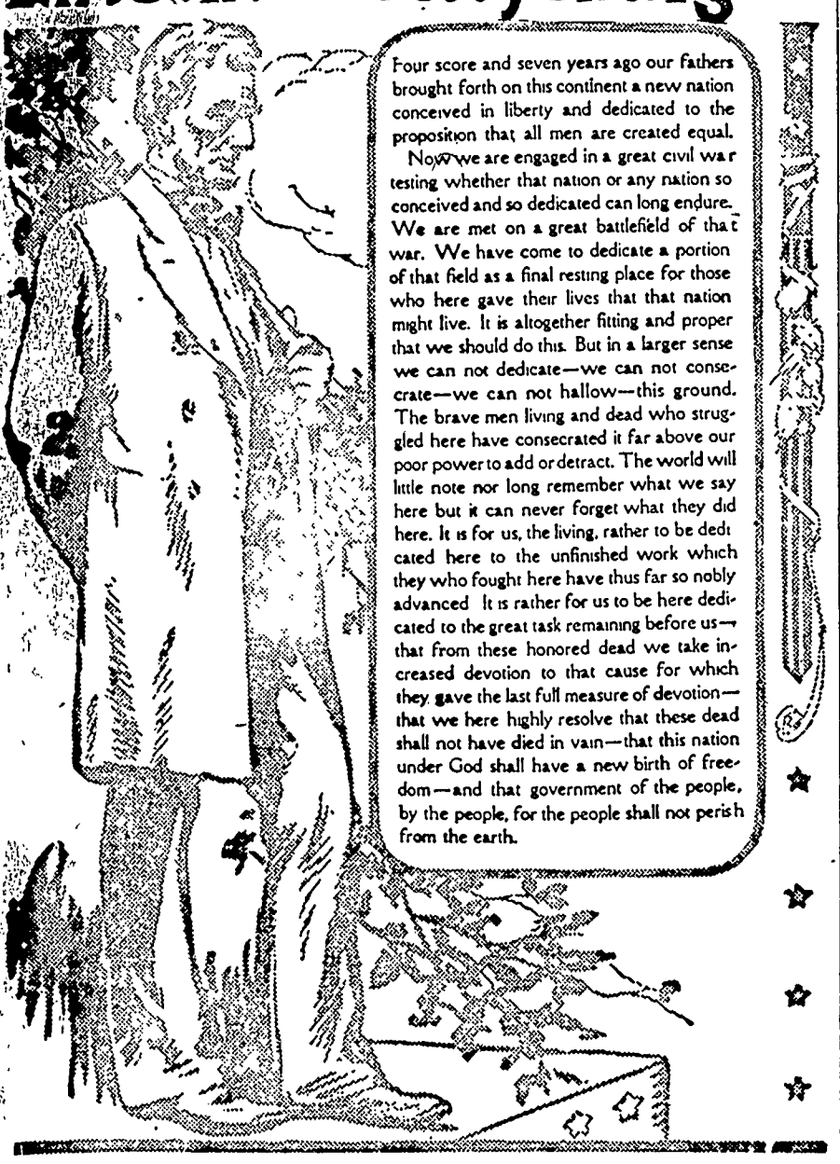
HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS

Lincoln at Gettysburg



Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war testing whether that nation or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we can not dedicate—we can not consecrate—we can not hallow—this ground. The brave men living and dead who struggled here have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.

Abraham Lincoln

This man whose homely face you look upon,
Was one of Nature's masterful, great men;
Born with strong arms, that unfought battles won,
Direct of speech, and cunning with the pen.
Chosen for large designs, he had the art
Of winning with his humor, and he went
Straight to his mark, which was the human heart;
Wise, too, for what he could not break he bent.
Upon his back a more than Atlas-load,
The burden of the Commonwealth, was laid;
He stooped, and rose up to it, though the road
Shot suddenly downward, not a whit dismayed.
Hold, warriors, councillors, kings! All now give place
To this dead Benefactor of the race!
—Richard Henry Stoddard.

Lincoln's Faith in American Principles

Never Lost Sight of Truth in Declaration of Independence.

Lincoln invoked the Declaration of Independence in his efforts to check the spread of slavery, but just as those who framed it uttered a maxim intended for all time, when merely seeking separation from Britain, so Lincoln reiterated an eternal and universal truth, and believed in it as such, Judge Charles C. Simons writes, in the Detroit News.

"I had thought the Declaration contemplated the progressive improvement in the condition of all men everywhere," he said. And he knew that it would outlive the death of slavery, just as the framers intended it should outlive their successful separation from Britain.

He closed his Springfield speech with this stirring appeal, after reading the Declaration with the Douglas interpolation: "Are you willing that the Declaration should thus be frittered away?—thus left no more, at most, than an interesting memento of the dead past?—thus shorn of its vitality and practical value, and left without the germ or even the suggestion of the individual rights of man in it?"

Three years later, on Washington's birthday, Lincoln, President-elect, stood in Independence hall, Philadelphia, on his way to the inauguration at Washington. Doesn't it, somehow, stir the blood and fire the imagination to think of Lincoln on the spot where the immortal Declaration was given to the world? "I have often inquired of myself," he said there, "what great principle or idea it was that kept this Confederacy so long together. It was not the mere matter of separation of the colonies from the motherland, but that sentiment in the Declaration of Independence which gave liberty not alone to the people of this country, but hope to all the world, for all future time."

Faith Again Voiced.

Speaking to the soldiers of an Ohio regiment toward the close of the war, Lincoln again voiced his faith in the American principle. "It is in order that each of you may have, through this free government which we have enjoyed, an open field and a fair chance for your industry, enterprise and intelligence, that you may all have equal privileges in the race of life, with all its desirable human aspirations. It is for this the struggle should be maintained, that we may not lose our birthright."

The world is full of strange contrasts and anomalies. It was a curious thing that the gentle, kindly, humane Lincoln should be called on to lead the nation in the greatest fratricidal war of history. It is a curious thing that today when passion, and prejudice and hate seem to rule humanity, there should be a world-wide revival of interest in Lincoln.

But there is hope in it. It may yet be that human nature will vibrate to the music of that passage which closes the first inaugural, "We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory stretching from every battlefield and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature."

Difficult to Recognize.

It is only when we understand the true character of our government, and why it was so organized and so established that we are able to recognize those projects which, in themselves seemingly wise, may when fairly considered be seen to destroy the harmony and threaten the integrity of the whole fabric. We sometimes fail to recognize in those things which seem to promise enlargement of liberty, things which in reality must result in curtailment of liberty. I have myself on occasion failed to recognize them, and so perhaps you may.

Not wholly has the original scheme of limitations, checks and balances been preserved. The electoral college in its original form was early swept aside. Perhaps wisely so. The differentiation between the two houses of congress by which they were to act as checks, one upon the other, has been partially obliterated by the popular election of senators. The representative organization of political parties, which while not created by the Constitution, owes its development to the representative system of the Constitution, has been almost wholly destroyed. I am not suggesting that any one of these basic changes is in itself vital, and besides they involve political controversies into which I do not care to enter—but I am indicating a tendency in respect to the checks and limitations of the Constitution which it is well for us to consider, especially when self interest and patriotism so happily combine to urge on us the perpetuation of the Constitution in the spirit of its founders.

WIDENED HEMLINE IS POPULAR; SLEEVES LEND THE MAGIC TOUCH

ARE you going to get a tailored suit this spring or a topcoat and frock? This is a question everybody is asking everybody in the realm of fashionland. Which, oh which shall it be? Since there are arguments in favor of either, and since fashion smiles impartially on both, the decision becomes a matter of individual preference.

Assuming, for the moment, that the suit is elected by popular vote, the question resolves itself into "what kind of a suit?" Short coat or long? Sheath-fitting skirt or full? To the former query the answer is "short," to the latter "full at the hemline."

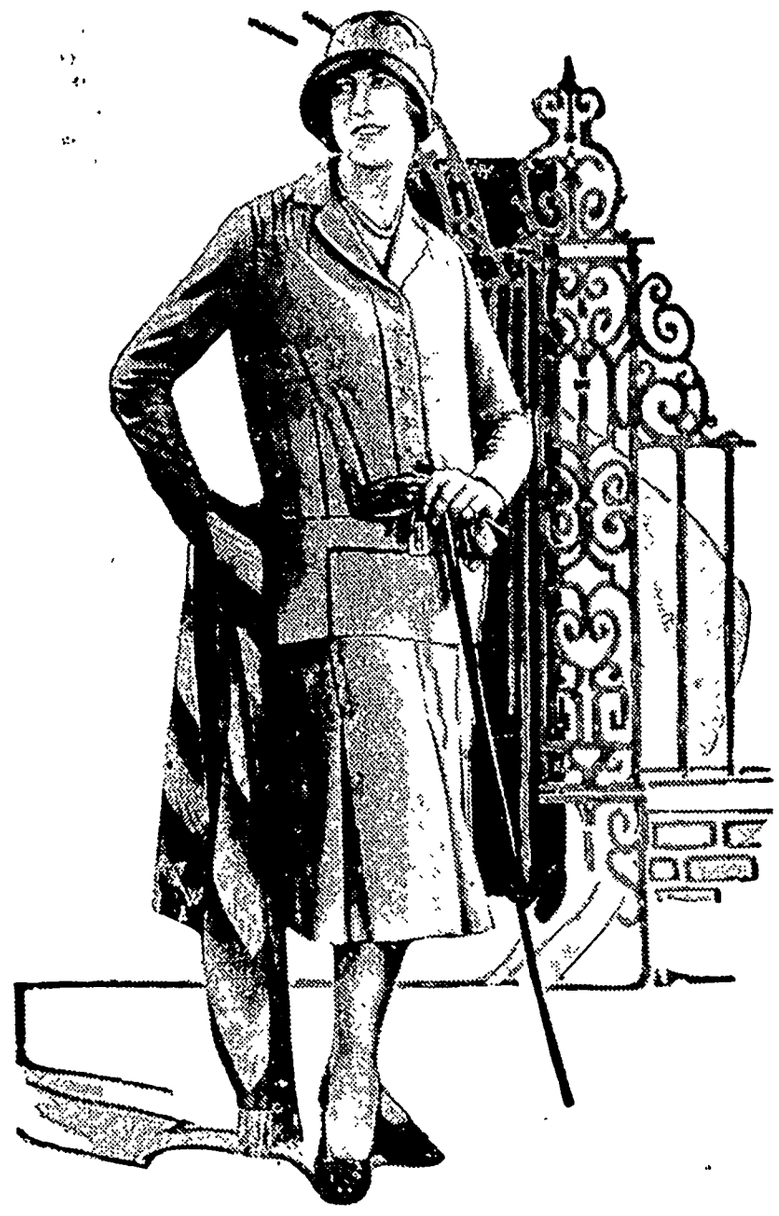
There are more ways than one of carrying out fashion's edict that the hemline of the two-piece tailored skirt be full. There is, for instance the circular skirt, which is the very latest whim for the trotteur of cloth. Then there are plaits, "kick," box, knife and otherwise with their placement as you please, at the front, sides, back or all around. The point is that fashion insists, no matter the method, fullness there must be to the smart tailored skirt.

The model in the picture shows the navy blue flannel coat with gray flannel skirt. An emblem worked with gold braid on the breast pocket with brass buttons for the front fastening impart a military air.

Perhaps you have made up your mind to get spring and summer sewing all done and over with before the "first robin" appears. If so, hurry up! Tempus fugit! Perhaps your good resolves include the "making over" of one or more of last season's dresses. Pause a moment ere you begin to rip the seams of this perfectly good little frock. Perhaps all it needs is just an added style touch or two to bring it up-to-date, until it takes on the airs of a brand new 1926 spring dress. Worth trying, at any rate.

Now just what might this magic "style touch" be, you ask, and fashion answers in accents loud and clear, "sleeves." Yes, just a pair of ornate cut-to-the-latest-pattern sleeves will turn the trick.

Do you happen to possess a very simple sleeveless black satin frock of last year's vintage? Looks hopeless, does it, from the standpoint of this season's style demands? Here, Miss Home Dressmaker or Mrs. Newlywed or Madame, if you please, is your chance to distinguish yourself as an expert seamstress in the eyes of your family and your friends. The fanciful sleeves in the picture furnish the inspiration for many an hour's busy sewing. Several detachable pairs of sleeves forming a partnership with one simple black frock will insure a smart costume for every occasion.



Showing Stitched Down Inverted Plaits.

What Detachable Sleeves Will Do.

For the sleeves shown first in the collection, flesh-colored georgette is suggested with bandings of narrow black satin ribbon. Perhaps you prefer periwinkle blue or bright green. Either would be very effective. An exceptionally pretty set in black and gold lace is shown to the right. Most accommodating is the lace and georgette set which includes a vestee as well as sleeves and collar. It is lovely enough to transform even the most ordinary sleeveless frock or tunic into attire smart enough for afternoon bridge or club meetings.

successful manipulation of stitched-down inverted plaits. The jacket is of ultra-simple styling. Short-coat types similar to this one are stressed throughout the season's modes. Belts or suggestion of a belt as introduced in this youthful coat are very important in the styling of tailored suits.

Tweed, covert, oxford cloth, kasha and checks large and small enter in the race for supremacy. Novelty cloths are especially promising this season. The latter are often set off with trimmings of solid color.

In regard to short coats, wrist-length is favored. A vogue is heralded for their wear with contrasting skirts. Answering this smart and youthful mode is a blazer costume consisting of

Painted Bricks Make for Cellar Dampness

One of the biggest mistakes made by home owners who have homes of brick, or brickwork around their houses, is to paint over this material.

If paint is put on bricks in a home it may mean damp cellars. The temperature of a cellar is seldom the same as outdoors. In the summer it is cooler and in the winter it is warmer. The difference in temperature on either side of the bricks, added to the fact that the larger part of the cellar wall is beneath the ground, makes for dampness within the basement.

Except after a beating rainstorm, the outside of the bricks will not be damp, because the constant circulation of air outside dries them. Inside, the air is more stagnant. The dampness gathers on the bricks, and, as bricks are porous, soaks into them.

If the bricks are unpainted this dampness is drawn out of the bricks on the outside, and evaporates, with a resulting dry cellar. Paint these bricks and the lead in the paint will fill the pores of the bricks and prevent the dampness from escaping from the bricks to the outside, and that will mean damp walls in the cellar.

It is far better to leave the bricks their natural red and to know the dampness of the cellar has some means of being absorbed into the outer air.

City Dweller Finds Comfort in Suburbs

The grand rush to the suburbs—some of them ten miles out—is an irrepressible movement to restore "Home Sweet Home"; the kind with a lilac bush in the front yard and a place to hang the wash in the back yard. The old-fashioned ideal of home is not lost. It has been hampered, but as soon as city obstacles are removed—by easy and rapid transportation to the country—the home is restored much as it always has been.

The heart of man craves a little loneliness, just a little; and the suburbs afford it. It is not the loneliness of the city where there is no neighborly hobnobbing; but one which may be broken voluntarily. Sociability and segregation are nicely balanced. You have as much as you want of each, and when you desire repose, you can withdraw beyond your own jonquils.

In the suburb one feels that the family rooftree will last. It will not be swept away by apartment hotels or corner drug stores. It will be there for the children. It will be there for Thanksgiving and Christmas and weddings, ay, and funerals.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Brick's Good Qualities

In a building it is not possible to have real beauty without strength. The eye cannot be thoroughly satisfied if in the mind lurks the consciousness that the architect's creation is to be vanquished in the battle with time. Time is powerless to mar the beauty or to sap the strength of brick. Generations may come and go, but the sturdy brick walls of the homestead stay on. Brick may reach a venerable old age—it never reaches the state of decrepitude. Brick comes from the bosom of Mother Earth, in the form of plastic clay; it is hardened by the most powerful agency known in the world—fire—and is proof against the further attacks of fire; it defies wind and rain; it is as enduring as earth itself.—Exchange.

Plain Preaching

Local people, boost your town; run it up, instead of down.

Boosting is the thing it needs if it prospers and succeeds.

All its benefits are yours while your dwelling here endures.

From a purely selfish view, boosting is the thing to do.

But there's still another side—that of having civic pride.

Citizens must every one lend a hand and get things done.

Never knock; it doesn't pay; boosting is the better way.

Do not kick, but boost, instead; that's the way to get ahead.

Cave Husband's Refuge

Eastbourne, England, can hardly boast an interesting ecclesiastical history, and the most famous of its old-time parsons seems to have been Jonathan Darby, says the London Post. Parson Darby had been somewhat unfortunate in the choice of a wife, and to repair the mistake sought peace for study and meditation in a cave in the cliff at East Dean. In this retreat he stayed all the week, out of range of Mrs. Darby's tongue, and issued forth only on Sunday to conduct the service in church.

To Develop the Arms

Stand erect, stretch your arms out forward and clench the fists tightly. Holding your arms as stiff as possible, bend wrists outward and inward 15 times, with precision of movement. Next, holding your arms in the same position and clenching the fists, twist the forearms as far around as possible, first one way, then the other. Repeat 15 times.

News of Klemme and Vicinity

"Nick" Ell was operated on for appendicitis last week at a Mankato hospital. Latest news are that our former townsman is getting along fine.

Mr. and Mrs. Tom Mitchell, of Swea City took a trip to California after Christmas. They have now returned and Tomy is back at his job as depot agent at Swea City.

Erma Sampson had a birthday party Saturday to which a number of her little friends were invited. All had a good time and enjoyed the delightful refreshments which were served.

Sumner Trumbell's mother came over from Mason City last Thursday afternoon and visited with him and his wife until Monday when she went to Goodell for a few days visit with her son, Harry.

Rufus Haefner and wife returned from De Kalb, Ill., Sunday. They have rented Dr. Zinn's farm, the old Webner place where Mr. Marshall now lives and will move onto the farm soon.

We noticed a sign one day in a doctor's office which read, "Pay Your Doctor First." That is alright, but we are going to hang one up in our office which will read, "PAY YOUR PRINTER FIRST." And, is your subscription due?

The ground hog seemed to have hit it right this year. We have been having a lot of mild weather the past week and water stood everywhere after the thaw. It is again frozen up slightly and the weather is a bit colder.

The Klemme basket ball team is going to mix it with Ventura there this Friday night. A large delegations of Klemme fans should go with the boys and help them win this one. Ventura beat Klemme here a few weeks ago, but the boys are going even things up Friday night.

Rev. Grooshues, of Wisconsin, has been secured to preach at the Klemme Reformed Church. Rev. Grooshues and family will move to this place in the spring, as he begins his duties as pastor here on May 1st. Rev. C. A. Schmid will conduct services here every Sunday afternoon at 2:00 o clock until Rev. Grooshues arrives ta take charge.

Dr. D. P. Anderson returned from Ames Friday afternoon last week. He had been at both Des Moines and Ames attending a veterinarian convention for several days. As there was a basket ball game here Friday night, "Doc" just had to get back for it and he was there to help the Klemme fans do some husky yelling.

This week we have the announcement of F. J. Urich, of near Garner, who is a candidate for the office of supervisor. Mr. Urich is one of the old residents of the county and has always lived on his farm, and which business he has made a fine success. We are not so well acquainted with Mr. Urich but his Klemme friends all speak highly of him and say he is well qualified for the office he seeks, and that he will be a good man for the job of supervisor.

Mayor Frank Gruetzmacher has increased the Klemme Police Force by one new member—at least we suppose that is why he bought a German Police dog for. Frank has a fine dog, purchased of Vic Huenaman. The funny part of it was that Mrs. Doggie ran away Tuesday morning and kept Frank worried until the next day when he found her again and coaxed her home. He had visions of several $10 bills flying away and never to return. Maybe the dog was out looking for criminals!

This week we have two full size Public Sale Bills in the Klemme Times. Next Wednesday, February 17th Fred Krauss will hold a big sale on the farm 2 miles east and 80 rods north of Klemme. Look over Fred's big ad in this issue. He has a fine line of stock and machinery which will be sold at auction. Don't miss this sale. Then on Friday, February 19th Fred Knoke wil have a closing out sale on the farm 4½ miles north and 1 mile west of Klemme. This is a large sale of stock and a full line of machinery, all in good shape. Lok this ad over and see what you want. Sales are scarce this year and we doubt if there will be any others in this part of the country. Take them both in, they are both good sales.

"WHITE INDIAN"

Here's a story of the old days on the Mississippi—"Great River" of the Indian; "Father of Waters" of the White Man—the outlet to the sea of the Mississippi Valley, the Garden Spot of the World. Here Joliet and Marquette, La Salle and Bienville, George Rogers Clark and Andrew Jackson made history. Here Indian, Frenchman, Spaniard, Englishman and American battled for possession. Here, at St. Louis in 1804, the red and yellow flag of Spain came down, the tricolor of France went up and came down and the Stars and Stripes went up—to stay.

This story is of the days of Bienville and his colonization at New Orleans and Biloxi. The hero is William Brampton, "The White Indian," an agent of the English. The heroine is "Claire Dahlsgaarde," a handsome and mysterious young woman who is among the passengers on the wife-ship Maire, which brings women from France to the colonists. The hero rescues the heroine from a ruffian. Fate throws them together and in pity he befriends her and takes her with him when he escapes from New Orleans in an attempt to gain the English settlements with important reports. They have many exciting adventures in the wilderness with Indian and white man—and come to happy ending of their dangers. Hugh Pendexter writes the story with that close attention to historical accuracy which has won him a wide following.

The pirogue drifted into an eddy and, knowing I was in the immediate vicinity of Fort Rosalie, I leaped out and drew my dugout up on the bank. It was near sundown and the shadows were beginning to creep out from the western bank. Although having had three years of experience with the mighty river it always fascinated me; especially when the shadows began to rendezvous, or when the white mists danced before the rising sun.

I never tired of watching its irresistible and sullen onrush to the gulf. Such tremendous secrets the Mississippi could tell! What people had haunted its shores throughout the ages? Was the red man the first to attack the monsters drinking from its flood? I had traveled it much and always found it to be a mystery.

It was a sinister tyrant, a whimsical giant, what you would. It flowed through hobgoblin land. No tale was too strange and fantastic for belief if connected with the Mississippi. I prided myself on my hard-headed English sense, and yet I could not resist its lure. There was no beauty to attract me, such as I had observed along the more gracious Ohio. There was lacking that spell of utter desolation which I had found in pushing up the muddy current of the Missouri. It was a rapacious thing, a fickle thing; its potentials, its many promises of incredible achievements, haunted me.

Such puny triflers as La Salle and De Soto had been peremptorily dealt with; the assassin's bullet for one and the river's maw for the other. And these two were simply types of countless others, of high and low degree, even including my humble self and such savage yet dependable fellows as Damoan the Fox, who had parted from me at the mouth of the Ohio.

And what fortune did the river hold for Spain, for France, for England? Since the wreck of the Armada, Spain was out of the game except as it won temporary success by rather desultory playing. Solitude had made me something of a philosopher, just as my occupation tutored me in politics. If I filled my lonely watches with mooning over the mysteries of the inscrutable waterway, also did I observe much which pleased Governor Spotswood of Virginia, and other notable leaders along the Atlantic coast.

John Law's amazing circle of finance, with the mighty empire of France thoroughly gullible, was closely watched by us in America even if we could not foresee how swiftly the crash would follow the first symptom of weakness in his system. There are those who in calmer years have held that the fantastic notions concerning the Louisiana country grew up from the prodigious falsehoods nurtured by the Company of the Indies, better known as the Mississippi company.

I never could accept this process of reason; in truth, I reversed it. I have always held that Beau Law could not have staged the greatest gambling saturnalia of the ages had not the way been smoothly paved for him by Europe's credulity in the marvelous and impossible. Only because it was the age of fairy stories were half a million foreigners flocking madly to the dirty rue Quincampoix to trade in the shares of the Mississippi company.

We in Virginia and the Carolinas were intimately informed of the doings of Law from the time he organized his first company. It was common knowledge how map-makers and "historians" were vying with each other in popularizing miracles in the new world. One could lift one's self by the bootstraps in Louisiana. The Mississippi was out another name for hyperbole. Its tributaries drained regions where strange white races dwelt along the shores of vast inland lakes, hemmed in by sands of purest gold.

I was no skeptic concerning mines, and possible pearl fisheries in the gulf. But when immigrants poured in and expected to find unicorns and other dream-monsters in the land of the Paducahs (Comanches) I laughed. I knew the river as well as any voyageur. For three full years I had sailed it from the northern lakes to the gulf. I accepted mines as possibilities, for the wealth of the southern continent was a matter of history; but when they talked of dwarfs and giants and ethereally beautiful Indian maidens I must see them before believing. When Damoan the Fox heard such yarns—and he was most at home in the wigwam—he would smile with his tongue in his cheek.

The English feared that the impetuosity of the French in exploiting the Louisiana country, and their feverish efforts to populate it, would give the vast valley to Louis XV. But I could not forget that France's belief in the marvelous must be reflected in her colonists. And I could not believe that Louisiana would be held by those who believed in myths and fairies; no more than the English could have held the coast settlements if, instead of prosaically making homes, they had dwelt on the fantasied doings of King Arthur's knights. Trade was to shape the destiny of the Mississippi basin. Those who persisted in dwelling in elfdom must lose the race.

Beau Law's job was to keep his stock from exploding, and within three years he had seen it rise from 500 to 15,000 livres a share! The Englishman's job was to bring home-makers into the country and establish permanent communities. Homes and crops first, then mines if there be any. So far as I could foresee, the very nature of Law's advertising must defeat his plan to people the valley. From his residence in Place Louis le Grand he might order the sailing of many ships; but who would fill them? The absurd tales peddled by his agents could attract only the dissolute, the reckless, the purely adventurous, but never the heads of families.

The coming and going of these unstable classes would leave no French foothold on the land. In all my work of spying up and down the river I knew of but one menace to English ambitions; the linking of Canada to the gulf by a chain of forts, thereby making permanent settlements possible. This was the far-sighted plan of Louis de Buade, count of Frontenac, one of the greatest Frenchmen of his time. In the consummation of his original plans lay France's strength and England's peril.

To detect any adoption of this most sensible policy had engaged much of my time, and was responsible for my uneasy flitting up and down the river. The Kaskaskia settlements and the building of Fort Chartres might mean the scheme was being worked out in the Illinois country. It would amount to but little unless extended down to the gulf. Hence my desire to learn if Fort Rosalie had taken on any political importance, or remained simply a storehouse for French trade.

With my smooth-bore flintlock over my shoulder I made my way up the bluff crowned with oaks. When Iberville, that great apostle of Louisiana's commercial future, first saw the gracious hills around the main village of the Natchez Indians he fell in love with the spot. And he built the trading post and named it after Madame the Duchess of Pontchartrain. It was the first permanent French settlement in the valley south of Kaskaskia. Ah! But those French were beforehand. If they could have held what they were first to take how differently history would read!

It was now my business to reconnoiter the fort, and observe how much strength the place had gained since I was there last. Of first importance, also, was to learn the attitude of the Natchez toward the French.

White Apple, the main Natchez village, was located about three miles southwest of the fort on a small stream, and was less than three miles from the Mississippi. After reconnoitering the fort I planned to return to my pirogue and take the water route to this village. On my last passage up the river the Natchez were very friendly with the French; but much can happen between voyages.

The Chickasaws had been developing an ugly streak for months. Unlike the Natchez, the Choctaws and Chickasaws preferred New England rum to French brandy, while there was no questioning the superiority of English over French trade-goods.

I worked along the bluff until within sight of the post and breathed in deep relief. The storehouse seemed closed, and I could discover no signs of any new cabins in the background. The place had grown none unless it be some few settlers had built cabins invisible from my position. A minute of study satisfied me, and I began retreating toward my pirogue, when a noise between me and the river sent me to ground and to cover.

It was a slight tapping noise and suggested a woodpecker. I crawled toward it, but again sought cover as careless steps sounded in the growth. The man passed quite near me. He was a tall fellow, at least an inch over six feet, with the mahogany complexion and the graceful, powerful physique of the Natchez.

After he had passed from hearing I took his trail and easily followed it back to the edge of the bluff. It ended in an opening which afforded a magnificent view of the river; and there I found what had caused the tapping. And it made my heart glad; for it threatened much trouble for the people of young Louis XV and his dissolute uncle, the duke of Orleans, regent. When the French fell, the English went up—and contrawise.

It was a dressed skin, made fast to the bole of an ancient oak, with two reed arrows, painted red, stuck in the ground before it in the form of an X. On it was painted a hieroglyphic picture. In the upper right of the picture was the red and white feathered headdress worn by the Grand Soleil, or Great Sun, as the head chief of the Natchez was called.

Next was depicted a naked Natchez warrior holding a war club. Then came an arrow, pointing at a figure over the head of which was a crude representation of the fleur-de-lis. Below was a moon and the outline of a peach and a bunch of grapes, followed by many straight marks.

Being translated it announced that the Great Sun of the Natchez declared his intention of making war on the French during the Moon of Peaches. It was now the tenth of June, the Moon of Watermelons. The Moon of Peaches was July. Counting the marks I found there were 28 of them, and I knew that within 50 days war would begin if nothing intervened in the meantime to cause the autocrat of the Natchez to change his mind.

Here was a matter of great importance. Here was something to take to Bienville as a proof of my sincerity were the French inclined to suspect me of being English at heart as well as of name.

Aside from this instinct of self-preservation was the likelihood that the Natchez would change their minds before it came time to smoke the final war calumet. For Tattooed Serpent—erroneously called Stung Serpent by the French—war chief of the Natchez, and a brother of the Great Sun, had been a consistent friend of the French ever since the trouble in 1716, and his great influence would be against war. As his brother had great affection for him I did not believe the threat on the painted hide would be carried out.

Also, word of the declaration was sure to reach Biloxi speedily. However, for my purpose the declaration was of much importance, provided I were the first to carry the news down the river. Until changed, the war plans of the Natchez were of evil import to the lower valley. The man who first carried the word would be doing a great service for France. I proposed to do that service, and thereby learn things of more importance before starting north again.

Yes, surely did I have an excellent excuse for thrusting my head inside the French settlements once more, and giving the lie to any stories accusing me of being an English spy. And one did need the best of defenses when confronting Sieur de Bienville of the implacable will.

My message to the governor should tend to establish me in his good opinion, as he would promptly credit English traders with stirring up the trouble. Believing that, he must believe me to be a renegade Englishman with no love for my own people. It was a long cry from Beau Law and his ideas of finance to the fate of the Natchez, and yet it was but one of the striking demonstrations of cause and effect to be witnessed before the belief in pygmies and giants, beaches of gold and mountains of precious stones, was to disappear.

I stole back to my pirogue and pushed off and dropped down-stream, with no further thought of visiting the Indian village, and only anxious to be the first to carry the news to Bienville.

CHAPTER II

France Sends More Rubbish.

After leaving the hills and bluffs, I experienced that feeling which always came to me when descending the river alone; that is, that the river was sentient and was pursuing me. Foolish no doubt, yet impelling enough to make me swing my head frequently in staring back over the desolate flood and its burden of drift. I never experienced any bizarre sensation in fighting my way up-stream. I sharply missed the companionship of Damoan the Fox, a great scamp yet prince of woodsmen. Once I would have sworn a piece of drift suddenly darted behind a tangled mass of forest trees, as if propelled by human agency.

During my trip across Maurepas and for half the distance on Pontchartrain I might have been the last man in the world; for aside from wild fowl and the water life there was nothing to attract my attention. Then my isolation was shattered by the sight of a canoe coming toward me from the direction of Bayou St. Jean. As it drew nearer I decided its sole occupant was a voyager from the North. He, too, was much interested in me, for he rested his paddle and shading his eyes scrutinized me closely.

I also rested and waited for him to finish his study. Suddenly he drove his paddle over the side and came toward me swiftly. I slid the muzzle of my musket over the side and called on him to halt. Abrupt approaches in the Louisiana wilderness betokened hostility, or great friendship. And this shaggy fellow was unknown to me as yet.

"That is near enough," I called in French. "Who are you?"

"Pardieu! How proud he is! The White Indian will not greet his friend!"

The merry insolence of his voice could not be disguised. With a thoroughly amiable grin I dropped the musket between my feet and held up empty hands. He shot his lighter craft alongside and would have kissed me had I not held both his hands.

"Joe Labrador!" I exclaimed. "I thought you to be taking a wife at Montreal. Who would have thought of seeing you on Pontchartrain!"

"And you, Monsieur Brampton, the White Indian! My heart was broken when I found Yvonne had married a miserable, spindling fellow, who does writing for the governor. I come here to bury my heart. Little birds tell me France is to send over many beautiful women, like virgins. And to find you here, in monsieur's back door, as one might say!"

"I am making a short cut—"

"Diable! But you are a brave man!"

"Brave? How so? I know the river, and the forest and the Indians."

"White Indian" is evidently running into dangers of many kinds—the way of the spy is usually toward death.

THE AMERICAN LEGION

(Copy for This Department Supplied by the American Legion News Service.)

HOW AURORA POST GOT NEW MEMBERS

"The biggest check in the world" was signed recently by Mayor Charles H. Greene of Aurora, Ill., in paying his dues to Roosevelt-Aurora post of the American Legion for 1926.

Equipped with a 4-foot pencil, Mayor Greene affixed his signature to a giant check measuring 24 feet long and 10 feet high. The check was signed in front of the city hall of Aurora before a large crowd, after which it was rolled up placed on a military caisson and conveyed to the bank where it was cashed. A parade, including the high-school band, soldiers, Legionnaires, and city officials, followed the check on its triumphal ride to the bank.

The event marked the opening of a phenomenally successful and unique membership campaign in which novel stunts and methods were the rule.

To locate prospects for the Legion the newspapers printed as complete a list of Aurora ex-service men as could be gathered and headed the list with a coupon to be clipped, on which was printed: "To Unknown Soldiers of Aurora—if you are not on the following list, sign your name and address and mail to the Legion Survey Committee." Nearly two complete pages of valuable newspaper space were given to the printing of the long list of known service men in the effort to locate the "unknowns."

The churches of the city co-operated with the Legion in locating "unknown soldiers." More than 1,000 undiscovered former service men were revealed to the membership committee through the agency of the churches.

Preceding these steps, a telephone campaign was conducted in which 15 girls called every residence in the city in an effective effort to locate veterans.

Prospects who were not signed the first day were sent telegrams which were delivered by 30 boy scouts. Thus impressed by the urgency of the matter, and weakened by the "rush act," prospects signed on the spot.

An "Off-to-Paris Night" was a unique and much applauded feature of the campaign. A large street car float representing the Leviathan, with a full passenger list Paris bound, "sailed" through the streets of Aurora and anchored at the town armory, which for the occasion was designated as "Paris." There the Legionnaires disembarked and made merry in true Parisian style, regaling with a dance, girly-girly show and review.

A mutt dog parade through the main streets for the kids of the town with cash prizes for winners, was a stunt that put the words "American Legion" on all lips. The Forty and Eight, honor organization of the Legion, also put on their fun-making stunts in connection with their initiation ceremonies during the campaign.

Two Girls and One Boy Legion Essay Winners

Two girls and a boy were declared to be national winners in the annual essay contest conducted by the national Americanism commission of the American Legion for 1924-25.

Miss Elizabeth Shankland of Watseka, Ill., took first place among the 200,000 and more essayists who entered the competition. She won a scholarship of $750 to be used in her further education. She plans to take a course in music at Northwestern university. She has been teaching piano since she was twelve years old.

Second place, with a scholarship of $500, was won by Miss Gertrude Carter Stockard, whose home is on a 240-acre farm at the top of one of the most beautiful hills in the Ozarks, a mile and a half above the little village of Mountainburg, Ark. She has never attended school a day in her life.

Her mother, who was for fifteen years a teacher in the schools of Eureka Springs and Fort Smith, Ark., directed her sole instruction. She has been driving in to Fort Smith in the family car once a week, when the roads are not too muddy, to study music at one of the best studios in the Southwest. She plans to continue her music at the School of Applied Arts in New York city, while she works on the bachelor of arts and bachelor of education degrees at Columbia university.

Earle A. Tompkins, now a freshman at Massachusetts Agricultural college, won the third prize of $250. His home is at Easthampton, Mass. He plans a business career.

The essays dealt with reasons why the Legion, as an organization of World war veterans, is concerned with upholding and defending the Constitution of the United States, as Legionnaires by their constitution are pledged to do.

Radio Was Popular

Millions of people throughout the country listened in on radiocast specialties and news of the national convention of the American Legion at Omaha. Two thousand individuals appeared before the microphone of station WOAW, which was on the air continuously from 8:15 a. m. to 11 p. m.

By THOMAS A. CLARK,
Dean of Men, University of Illinois.

The envelope, all beautifully embossed in flowers and butterflies and chubby round cupids, was lying on my desk when, at the ringing of the last bell, I slipped into my seat in the fourth-grade room. She had already come in, and her little curly brown head was just showing above the top of her geography, but in spite of the fact that she seemed so interested in study I felt that she was watching me.

The package was not sealed, so under cover of the desk I drew out the valentine. It was crinkly and lacy and very beautiful in my eyes, and I felt a thrill of happiness as I held it in my hand. Within there were verses, and they breathed of tenderness and love. On one corner, lest I should be in doubt as to the identity of the sender, were printed the initials "M. B."

All morning I was happy as I stole shy glances into the envelope and read the printed words; in the evening I was happier still as I walked home with her; and I am happy today at the memory of it all.

We are strangely restrained and unappreciative and unsentimental, most of us. If we love anyone it takes a tragedy or a cataclysm to get a statement out of us. We expect our friends or the members of our family to guess how we feel without our saying so. "Don't you like my dinner?" a housewife asked her husband. "Well, did I kick?" was his tender, appreciative response. One learns to know that things are satisfactory if no one makes objection. I saw a man, married for ten years, taking a bunch of violets home to his wife on Valentine day, and it gave me a sensation, it was so unusual.

Does anyone ever tell the minister when he preaches a good sermon? When someone helps you, or gives you courage, or stimulates you to effort, do you let him know, or do you take for granted that he will understand? Have you ever told mother what a void there would be in the world if she were gone? If anyone these days loves his teacher, as we were instructed to do, does he ever say so? I imagine not; all of these things would seem too sentimental.

It is so much easier to send flowers to the funeral, or to subscribe to the memorial fund than to write the note of appreciation, or to utter the word of love, or to give expression to thanks when those who have served us and sacrificed for us and made our lives joyful are themselves still alive. We don't often send the valentine.

I found the little paper lace affair with its verses in my desk the other day, treasured through all the vicissitudes that have come to me since I was ten:

"If you love me
As I love you
No knife can cut
Our love in two."

It gave me pleasure all day to think of it.

Old and New Customs

One of the characteristics of the old-fashioned valentine was the secrecy with which it was invested. The sender was most unwilling to hang his heart upon his sleeve, for there were altogether too many daws waiting for a chance to pick at it. The valentine was carefully wrapped and was intended for the eyes of the recipient, and nobody else.

But investors today who spend a dime or a quarter on a valentine don't care a tinker's commission whether anyone sees them or not. Their missives go openly through the mails and Dan Cupid may yell his message all along the route.

Of course, there is much less reason for keeping the messages under cover than there used to be. Not only are the vulgar "comics" a thing forgotten, but the "coo-coo," "lovey-dovey," "dew-you," "heart-part" sentimental effusion has also disappeared.

Valentines

John Archie Jones, a dandy youth
Of twenty-one or there,
Spent dollars for a valentine
To send his lady fair;
But when he saw the maiden next
She gave no hint or sign
Of all the dear and loving words
That filled that valentine.

Now Jimmie Hicks, a little boy
Just turned five, they say,
Spent one lone nickel on a card
To send to Dolly Gray;
And that same eve, so neighbors tell,
This four-year-old young miss
Right out where all could see and hear
Gave Jimmie Hicks a kiss.

1925 TAXES OF U. S. $6,211,625 OVER '24

Gain of $24,599,724 in Income Receipts—Miscellaneous Source Falls Off.

Washington.—Reduced federal tax rates during the calendar year 1925 did not affect the total volume of taxes received by the government, which showed a substantial increase. The gain was entirely in the income tax division, however, with receipts from other sources showing a falling-off under lower taxes.

Figures on internal revenue receipts by states for 1925 compared with receipts for 1924, issued by the Treasury department, show that the receipts for the year just closed exceeded those from all internal sources in 1924 by $6,211,625.

Total receipts for 1925 were $2,694,257,246 and for 1924 were $2,688,045,620, while income tax receipts for 1925, totaling $1,825,704,135, exceeded such receipts in 1924 by $24,599,724. The 1925 receipts from miscellaneous sources were $868,533,110, or $18,388,098 less than in 1924, and yet the total 1925 receipts exceeded those of the previous year. Miscellaneous receipts in 1924 were $886,941,208.

Receipts from the sale of initial revenue stamps aggregated $95,358,414 in 1925 and internal revenue receipts through the customs office totaled $50,212.

Bureau Heads Assailed by Colonel Mitchell

Washington.—A parting shot at the "bow and arrow men who make up the self-perpetuating oligarchies" in the War and Navy departments was fired by William Mitchell, whose resignation from the army recently went into effect, and prior to his leaving on his nation-wide speaking tour.

"I shall always be on hand in case of war or emergency, wherever I am needed," the former colonel said as he bade good-by to his former counsel, Representative Frank R. Reid of Illinois. On February 10 Mr. Mitchell will start his tour with a speech in New York city in Carnegie hall. He will then speak in Boston. After that he will speak in the following cities: Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Detroit, Columbus, Dayton, Cincinnati, Chicago and Milwaukee.

Looking as dapper in his derby hat and gray overcoat as he did in his uniform, Mr. Mitchell seemed in the best of spirits. "No man has had such a wonderful life in the service as I have had," he said.

Long hard wear built into every one!

Farmers everywhere are turning to "U.S." Blue Ribbon Boots and Overshoes!

The "U.S." Blue Ribbon Walrus slips right on over your shoes. Its smooth rubber surface washes clean like a boot. Made in red or black, 4 or 5 buckles

THIS is why. "U.S." Blue Ribbon overshoes and boots are built with thick, oversize soles, tough as an automobile tire. Into the uppers goes rubber so elastic that constant bending won't crack it. Anchored in this rubber are the strongest of reinforcements.

Look for the "U.S." Blue Ribbon when you buy. It will pay you!

United States Rubber Company

If you cut a strip of rubber from a "U.S." Blue Ribbon boot or overshoe you'd find it so elastic it would stretch more than five times its length.

...ler Not Always Regarded With Favor

Whistling is forbidden in Iceland, where it is regarded as a breach of the divine law. But whistling is regarded with disfavor in other places as well. In the dressing room of a theater, for example, it dooms a play if anyone whistles within hearing of the players who are "making up" for the first performance, according to a very old theatrical superstition.

On shipboard you must not whistle unless you want to bring a gale of wind. You may whistle just a little in ...alm, if you wish for a bit of wind. ...ilors generally believe you are ...y to get much more than you ...t.

Glaciers

You liked the music instruments that glaciers made, but no songs were ever so grand as those of the glaciers themselves, no falls so lofty as those which poured from brows and chasmed mountains of pure dark ice. Weird Coffee Recipe

French coffee, Turkish coffee, Russian coffee, all have had their vogue among those who are constantly seeking the bizarre; but in "All About Coffee" we find a recipe which should be weird enough to satisfy anyone's taste. It is "Judge" Walter Rumsey's "new and superior way of making coffee" as given in 1657.

You must "take equal quantity of Butter and Sallet-oyle, melt them well together, but not boyle them. Then stirre them well that they may incorporate together. Then melt therewith three times as much Honey and stirre it well together. Add thereunto powder of Turkish Cophie, to make it Electuary."

Butter, salad oil, honey, and coffee mixed!

Aged Students

Cato at eighty, took it into his venerable head to learn Greek and Plutarch, almost as late in life, learned Latin. Theophrastus began his work on the characters of men at ninety. His literary labors were ended only by death. Socrates learned to play on musical instruments when well advanced in life. Colbert, the famous French statesman, returned at sixty to his Latin and law studies, and the great Doctor Johnson applied himself to Dutch but a few years before his death. Then there is the now forgotten Marquis de St. Aulaire, who was once regarded as a remarkable prodigy. At the age of seventy he began to write poetry and contemporaries declared that his verses were "full of fire, delicacy and sweetness."

Slow Growths of Oaks

England's famed oaks are disappearing. Many oaks were cut down during the war, as the wood was urgently needed. Said a botanist: "The wood of an oak is not really any good until the tree is four hundred years old, and people today cannot afford to grow oaks for posterity. Originally large parts of England were covered with oaks. The tree is almost a rarity now in some places. It is said that an oak takes 400 years to grow to full size, is mature for another 400 years and takes 400 years more to decay In some cases I should say this is true."

British Expert Sees Addition to Wealth

Experiments in producing oil from coal, in which various science departments at Birmingham (England) university have been collaborating for three years, have shown that 61 per cent of liquid can be extracted from Lancashire coal by powdering it and subjecting it to very high pressures of hydrogen gas. Professor Nash, who has taken a leading part in research, when asked as to the significance of the discoveries from the standpoint of industrial utilization of British coal resources, said he was only able to announce that the laboratory tests had demonstrated oil could be got from coal. The commercial exploitation he was not competent to discuss. The liquid products have not been investigated in detail, but apart from small proportions of unidentified substances they consist of hydro-carbons which are basis of all fuel oils. South Staffordshire coal gave 37 per cent of liquid, while a South Wales coal gave 26 per cent.

Cause Enough

A camel has its limit of endurance as the old saw concerning the ultimate straw and the broken back will testify. Mrs. North also had her limit, which was finally reached when an argument, about which little could be understood, continued with unabated fury for two hours in the Smith household next door.

Calling to Willie Smith, who was playing in the back yard, Mrs. North asked the seven-year-old shining light of the warring Smiths:

"What is all the row about, Willie?"

"Oh, mamma put her cushion on daddy's chair and he sat down on it," replied the small lad.

"Why, that is no cause for such an argument, is it?"

"Sure it is! It was mamma's pin cushion!"

Soybeans furnish the protein corn lacks.

There ain't no justice here on this earth when a young feller marries a nice, good lookin' willowy wife and then inside a coupl'a years she eats herself from a graceful willow into a stocky oak. Maybe that's the reason some of the old boys used to hitch their wives to the plows!

A good windbreak saves costly feed.

IOWANS ARE WARNED TO LOOK OUT FOR SEED CORN GRAFTERS

State Law Requires That All Seed Be Properly Labeled For Buyer

DES MOINES, Feb. 18.—Iowa farmers are warned to be on the alert for tricky seed dealers, in a bulletin sent out by Mark G. Thornburg, secretary of agriculture.

In the 1,000 seed tests made by the department last year, Thornburg states there were many dealers checked up who were offering impure seed for sale.

The secretary is particularly interested this year in view of the scarcity of good seed corn and the high price of clover seed.

The state law requires that all offered for sale within the state properly labeled showing the variety, noxious weed seed, approximate germination, where it is grown and in case of clover, the year produced.

The dealers outside of the state have to comply with the Iowa law when they sell direct to the farmer and Secretary Thornburg declares asserts it is safer to buy from reliable seed dealers within the state. Inspectors are already busy checking up on seed samples.

FRUITS OF THE BANK GUARANTEE

(From The Journal, Lincoln, Neb.)

Not a dollar lost by any bona fide depositor in a single state bank of Nebraska during 15 years.

Twelve million dollars paid to depositors in failed banks within the past 6 years.

No withdrawals of money from banks for fear of losing it in a failure.

Business conditions generally better and farmers more prosperous here than in neighboring states.

Such is the record as it stands since the state bank guaranty fund was established and put into operation, in 1911. Today Nebraska occupies the enviable position of being the only state in the union where the closing of a bank creates no apprehension in the public mind and does not lead to 'runs" on other institutions.

Nebraska depositors know that they will get their money back, no matter what happens. Business goes on in the ordinary course, even when it becomes known that a bank is in difficulty. Public confidence in banks generally remains unshaken when one is forced to suspend. And the money of depositors stays in the banks, where it is available to meet the needs of their customers, instead of being pulled out and hidden away in old shoes and tin cans, or buried in the ground, where it would do nobody any good.

No wonder the Nebraska bank guaranty system is attracting attention elsewhere. It is something new which the Cornhusker state has worked out for itself in a highly successful manner. Other states—Oklahoma, Kansas and North Dakota—have also experimented with the bank guaranty, but with very unsatisfactory results. Here is one place where the plan really operates as it was intended to.

It is nothing more nor less, as Secretary Van Peterson of the Nebraska guaranty fund commission explained to the tri-state credit men's association meeting at Des Moines, than a system of compulsory mutual insurance among the state bankers, whereby all stand behind the deposits of every bank.

In the beginning, most Nebraska bankers were strongly opposed to the guaranty idea. They complained that it would compel strong banks to insure the weak ones—which it does. But when the time of stress arrived and banks began to fail, the strong institutions found that the guaranty fund was their own salvation. Except for it, doubt and suspicion as to the solvency of nearly all banks would have arisen, and many an institution which has come safely through the period of depression would have been forced to close.

Realization of this fact has converted most bankers from their former attitude of hostility to a warm and whole-hearted defense of the guaranty plan. It is probably true, as Secretary Peterson told his Des Moines audience, that there are not more than 5 per cent of the bankers in Nebraska operating under the system who would vote to discard it.

Iowa, which has had an appalling number of bank failures in the last two years, involving losses of many millions of dollars which fell upon the depositors, is looking to the example set by Nebraska as offering a way out of her troubles. There is little doubt that the next session of the legislature in Iowa will pass a guaranty law modeled after the one this state has.

"Without the confidence of the people no bank could keep its doors open," Secretary Peterson declared in his talk at Des Moines. That is literally and absolutely true. In Nebraska the people have full confidence in banks because of the guaranty fund. It is a very simple application of the rule of cause and effect.

FARM WOMEN TO LEARN A. B. C. OF NEWS WRITING

All Correspondents Invited To Attend Meeting At Britt

With a desire to furnish the newspapers of their locality with real news stories of Farm Bureau and other achievements and happenings, the Farm Bureau has arranged for a meeting of the farm women and for the club leaders of Hancock County, on Thursday, February 25, at Britt, with H. J. Metcalf, of the Agricultural Extension Service, of Ames, for the first lesson of a news training course, which will embrace the fundamentals of newspaper writing and which, it is hoped, will enable those interested to supply the press of the county with real news stories rather than with material which in many cases fails of publication because of lack of conformity to the rules which govern in newspaper offices.

These schols, which are scheduled for many counties in Iowa, both with the 4H Club Girls and with the reporters of the women's work, are designed to teach only the fundamentals, or the A. B. C.'s of writing, in order that the newspapers may be saved work and worry and also that such stories as may be written will have the greatest value in the most condensed form. Many of the papers are weeklies that cannot give unlimited space and it is therefore necessary that stories contain all the news value in as interesting condensed form as possible.

Country correspondents of every newspaper in Hancock County are invited to attend this school.

KLEMME WINS GAME AT VENTURA

KLEMME BOYS WIN OVER VENTURA IN FAST GAME

Will Play Swaledale There This Friday Night

Both the Klemme high school boys basket ball team and the Alumni Girls team went to Ventura last Friday night for a double-header game with the fast Ventura teams.

The Klemme girls lost by a small score to the Ventura girls. The Klemme girls made more baskets, but in most cases were only allowed one point on a basket by the referee who decided that the method used by Klemme in an over-head throw only counted one point. The girls have never before been cut on points for throwing baskets as they did and of course this threw them off and lost them the game.

Boys Put Up Real Scrap

The boys game between Ventura and Klemme started out with a basket shooting streak and fast snappy team work on the part of Klemme that gave our boys a lead of 15 to 3 against Ventura in the first quarter. After a rest Ventura came back strong and began to make things real interesting in our camp, piling up a few baskets and sort of evening things up so that at the half it looked like a speedy battle was due.

The third quarter began with the fastest floor work we have seen for some time. Both teams took no chances and both sides put up a strong defense when the opposing side threatened.

It was a see-saw game and but few field baskets were made on either side. A few minutes before time was up the game was tied 22-22 and it looked like an extra period would have to be called. Tanner got a free throw about one minute before the time was up which netted Klemme an extra point and put them in the lead, They held Ventura down for no scores and Klemme won the contest.

It was a fast, snappy game all the way through and both teams fought like tigers. Klemme was somewhat crippled during one quarter when Gibbs had to quit his post at center to get rested up, as he was recently sick and was not able to stand the gaff for a whole game. Patet played at center and Stokesbary went in. The boys played a good game but the regular formation was broken up to some extent and this was advantageous to Ventura who were not so slow to take up the situation.

Ventura beat Klemme here a few weeks ago, but the boys have evened up that by taking Ventura's scalp on their own floor. And that's that.

Swaledale Tomorrow Night

Klemme boys go to Swaledale tomorrow night, Friday, for a return game with them. Klemme won a decisive victory over Swaledale a few weeks ago. Let's all go and boost for Klemme and help them win this game too.

P. T. A. Meeting Well Attended

Our P. T. A. was well attended on Tuesday night. Several from Goodell were present to enjoy seeing the Grammar room spellers defeat the team from the Klemme Grammar room. Our spellers seeed stage struck and went down on words they knew well enough how to spell. We were glad to have our guests from Goodell and hope they may come again.

In a few weeks we shall take some of our spellers to Goodell and have another contest. Hope to be better there.

To Go To Contest At Belmond

On Wednesday night of next week, on February 24, Richard Ax will together with Beatrice Busch and Myrtle Irving, speak for Klemme at a Four School State Contest at Belmond. We hope several from Klemme can and will go to boost for Klemme.

County B. B. Contest Next

On Friday night of next week our boys will journey to Britt to begin their struggle for the County Championship in the basket ball tournament.

They will play Kanawha and if they win they will then play Garner, Saturday morning following.

Crystal Lake will be paired with Corwith and Britt and Hayfield will lock horns.

The Coach at Algona has been engaged to officiate at the tournament. Ra! Ra! Ra! for Klemme!!!

COAL STRIKE ENDS; LOSS ONE BILLION

Agreement Sends 158,000 Men Back to Pits—Out Since September 1, 1925.

Philadelphia.—The longest and most costly strike in the history of the anthracite industry has been settled.

Ratification of the terms of peace agreed upon by the scale committee of the miners' union and the executive committee of the operators sends 158,000 workers, who have been on strike since September 1, 1925, to the pits. Normal coal production will be reached in two or three weeks.

It is estimated the miners lost $150,000,000 in wages during the strike. The operators are said to have lost approximately $200,000,000 in overhead and losses of profits and wastage. The slump in business in the hard-coal region and to railroads is impossible to estimate. A total wastage of one billion dollars by the struggle of operators and miners is the unofficial estimate.

The settlement was reached on the following terms:

Immediate resumption of work on a 4½-year contract ending August 31, 1930, at the scale of wages prevailing when the strike began. The miners had demanded an increase of $1 per day for day men and 10 per cent for contract labor.

Provision for revision or modification of the wage agreement once a year beginning January 1, 1927, on the request of either side.

If no agreemeent is reached within thirty days the issues shall be referred to a board of two and both sides bind themselves to abide by the board's decision.

The board shall be selected by the submission of three names by both sides, the miners to choose one of the men suggested by the operators and the operators to choose one of the men suggested by the miners. Unless specifically agreed the men named shall not be a member of the United Mine Workers' or be in the coal mining business.

The board shall be obligated to arrive at a decision within ninety days and if it deadlocks it may choose an umpire, in which event a majority vote shall be binding. The agreement does not make it obligatory or mandatory on the part of the board to choose an umpire.

It is understood that on a question of wage reduction the miners' representative would oppose reference to an umpire, while on a proposal of wage increase the operators' representative would act similarly. The contract, therefore, virtually means a four-and-a-half-year agreement at the old scale of wages, with the emphasis of settlement of disputes by mutual agreement, mediation, and conciliation and not by reference to a third party whose decision would be binding.

Provision was made for the working out of a system of "co-operation and efficiency" by the standing board of conciliation without the umpire. Although this clause made no reference to the check-off, it is an approach toward this demand of the miners.

The new contract provides for the equalization of wages as agreed to in the contract made two years ago. It also continues the anthracite conciliation board set up by the Roosevelt commission when it settled the 1902 strike and continued under the terms of each agreement since that time.

Millions in Tax Frauds; Suits Will Be Started

Washington. — In a far-reaching drive against federal tax-dodgers, treasury agents have uncovered frauds amounting to millions of dollars, it was announced.

Agents of the special intelligence section of the bureau of internal revenue are investigating the records of about 1,000 wealthy corporations and individuals, alleged to have made fraudulent or incorrect returns.

Estimates place the amount of taxes involved at about $100,000,000, although officials insisted that it would be difficult to fix an accurate figure owing to the complex nature of many of the anticipated court actions.

Several corporations and individuals of national note are under scrutiny, it is understood.

Dehorning of 100 Bull Elk Proves Hard Task

Missoula, Mont.—The task of rounding up 430 head of elk to be shipped from Moiese, in the Blackfeet Indian reservation, to Middleboro, Mass., has proved to be no sinecure and has resulted in delay in starting the consignment of wild animals to their new home in New England hills.

Chief among the difficulties encountered by the cowpunchers who were pressed into service, was that of dehorning 100 bull elk so they could be shipped East in electrically-lighted express cars without injury to each other.

DAIRY AND POULTRY PRICES PROMISING

Heavy Demand Predicted for Remainder of Winter.

Washington.—Farmers of the United States will get good prices for their dairy and poultry products during 1926, according to a forecast issued by the federal Department of Agriculture.

Continued heavy demand and heavy domestic dairy products production are seen for the remainder of the winter, with prices following the usual seasonal course. Feed prices will probably continue favorable to dairymen.

Egg production during 1926 will probably be larger and prices lower, with the average price to producers for poultry products below that of 1925, according to the statement. The department advises the desirability of greater efficiency rather than increased production.

The major factors regarded as likely to affect the 1926-27 dairy year are that there are fewer cows and heifers in this country than there were a year ago, that foreign competition will increase if weather conditions are normal and that probably less favorable industrial conditions will offset usual increases in demand.

Consumption of dairy products has been tending upward since the war and fluid milk consumption has been increasing 5 per cent a year, the statement said. General business conditions indicating slight slackening in industry and business activity during the latter half of 1926 will probably be reflected in dairy products prices.

Market prices of poultry, at least during the first six months of the year, are expected to be higher. Present comparatively small storage stocks will probably result in broader outlets for fresh-killed poultry, in the opinion of federal authorities.

Attack Two American Girls in Mexican Town

San Diego, Cal.—Seven persons, including Zenaido Llanos, chief of police in Tijuana, have been arrested in connection with the abduction and attacking of Audrey and Clyde Peteet, two American girls, in the Mexican town.

The American girls had gone to Tijuana, which is across the border a short distance from here, with their parents for a visit.

The two girls with their father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. T. M. Peteet, were found in their home a few days ago, all but one of them dead and the other dying from gas which had been turned on with apparently suicidal intent. Authorities believe the family determined upon this course when they returned and felt that shame had been visited upon them as the result of their visit to the Mexican town.

While the investigation was under way in Tijuana, Frank Bohr, American vice consul at Mexicali, was preparing to start a separate probe of the alleged atrocities under orders from the American state department.

Two Letters

The first written twenty years ago, the second recently by Mrs. J. H. Bourland, Frankston, Texas.

June 2, 1904, she writes:—

"For twenty-three years I was a constant sufferer from chronic catarrh. I had a severe misery and burning in the top of my head, a continual dropping of mucus into my throat causing frequent expectoration. My entire system became involved and I grew worse. It seemed as if I could not recover from a constant cough and frequent attacks of bilious colic. My bowels were affected, causing alarming hemorrhages. I tried many remedies and finally took Pe-ru-na. In three days I was relieved of my bowel trouble and entirely cured by five bottles. I most cheerfully recommend Pe-ru-na."

June 30, 1924, Mrs. Bourland writes again:—

"I will soon be seventy-nine years old and enjoy good health for one of my age. I still recommend Pe-ru-na and take it myself when necessary."

For more than half a century Pe-ru-na has a proud record of good done. Men and women the world over stand ready to testify to its value in the treatment of catarrhal disorders.

THE GIRL

SYNOPSIS.—Traveling by canoe on the Mississippi, on his way to Biloxi in the early days of the settlement of Louisiana, William Brampton, English spy, known to Indians and settlers as the "White Indian," sees a Natchez Indian post a declaration of war against the French. For his own purposes, he hastens to Biloxi to carry the news to Bienville, French governor.

"Ah, but Sieur de Bienville? I, your friend, wish by all the saints that you knew him! After you went up the river the last time 40 of his excellency's soldiers deserted, running away to Carolina. And he vowed he would hang you if he ever caught you, for enticing them away."

This was disturbing news. I could trust Joe Labrador, old companion in many a venture, to speak naught but the truth. Then I became angry, as a man will who is wrongfully accused. There was much Bienville could have arraigned me for; I might even have seduced his soldiers from their allegiance had it appealed to me as being feasible. So I became incensed now I was charged with something I was innocent of—doubly resentful because I had not had the wit to think of it.

Labrador mistook my silence for hesitation, and earnestly said:

"You must turn back at once before any of Monsieur du Pratz's people see and recognize you. I will go with you as far as Fort Rosalie, perhaps farther. I will forget my new wife. I will go beyond Chartres. Bah! there will be women enough for all of us. Sieur de Bienville is in a temper. Now France and Spain have had a peace-smoke he is like a bear with a sore head. For years he has begged to have the seat of government changed to la Nouvelle Orleans. He has been denied. Pardieu. What will the imbeciles in France have? Bienville is to make the Lilies grow in the valley. Yes. He is to send the immigrants on their way as far as the Missouri and the Yazoo. To be sure. But behold! Nothing but jailbirds, worn-out rakes and women of the street have been sent over. And even these so fast he cannot have time to send them to the plantations. Thank the good God some decent women will be coming along now! Bienville is a bad man to have against one."

During Labrador's outburst I had had time to cool off. I remembered the card I had to play, and could not believe the governor would deal harshly with me. I was innocent of decoying his soldiers away. They had not needed my urging to make them deserters. And small wonder that any were left for garrison duty, now it had become necessary for the governor to quarter them among the Indians, where they dressed — rather, undressed — and painted themselves like savages, and learned ways of idleness, which unfitted them for routine work.

"Where is the governor?" I asked.

"At New Biloxi. If he has not been warned of your coming you have every chance to get away. It is your lucky star that sent you by this cut-off instead of down to la Nouvelle Orleans; for he has spoken ill of you there, and every cabin is ready to gobble you up."

"He is unjust. He wrongs me. I'll see him. No man on earth can send me running to cover when I am innocent," I declared, feeling very virtuous because I was innocent of the crime charged.

He eyed me admiringly, yet pityingly.

"You know you are English," he softly reminded me.

"Runaway English," I gruffly corrected. "There are runaway English, just as there are runaway Frenchmen. I've lived on the river for three years. It suits me. I'll stay."

"Ma foi! Yes, you'll stay!" he groaned.

"And you? You go back to Orleans?"

He hesitated, his soul struggling between friendship, fear and hopes of matrimony. One of the last two won for a time; and he muttered:

"I return to Bayou St. Jean. When the ship comes in some of the women are to be sent at once to la Nouvelle Orleans. I shall be there, waiting. I shall marry a good girl. If she turns out bad I can always go deep into the forest."

I could not blame him for avoiding my dangerous company when his presence could aid me none. He was one of the Labradors of Canada, and like the majority of the Canadian born or bred had small liking for the French born, just as the latter looked with contempt on the children of the new world.

He showed his native astuteness in avoiding the governor's displeasure by keeping clear of me for the time. I knew that when it came to a pinch he would cheerfully make any sacrifice to help me; for there was a small matter between us, born of the dangers of the Illinois country, an affair of my aiding him to escape the stake. And he believed he was indebted to me.

He reasoned that just now he could help me none by accompanying me to Biloxi. More than likely such an association with the White Indian—as I was called because of my forest-running—would place him under suspicion. And lastly, were not new wives coming to la Nouvelle Orleans, and he on the spot would have first choice

"My friend," he softly called as his light canoe moved off a few rods toward the St. Jean shore, "if you find the path rough I shall know it. The river is all ears and a great gossip. My ear is to the ground. I shall hear. If the worst comes the river path to the north shall be opened, and we will follow it and find plenty of room to live our lives in the good God's country up there. You are runaway English. I will kiss my wife goodby and be runaway French. Bon jour et bon voyage."

Bienville had vision. He knew the importance of a river port. He had fretted much because the government had ignored his preference for New Orleans. It was the one spot on the river in close proximity to the gulf that would answer for a permanent settlement. I think he would have won his point if not for a rise in the river inundating the little settlement; and Biloxi was again chosen. Like a shuttle-cock the seat of government had shifted back and forth between Biloxi and Mobile.

If any one could seal the Mississippi valley for France it would be Bienville with his bulldog determination and his commonsense. Even though working under the tremendous burden of trash for colonists and the company's frantic orders for the discovery of mines, or anything else which could be immediately realized upon as an asset, he believed he could win out if permitted to develop New Orleans and other river ports. To control the destiny of the valley from the gulf was impractical. One might as well try to govern it from Pensacola as from Mobile or Biloxi. And I was determined to complete my journey and meet this cool-headed, sagacious executive with but one card to play against his belief that I was something more than a renegade Englishman.

For the rest of the trip across the lake I saw no one except a Choctaw hunter after birds, and was opposite the mouth of the River of Pearls, when two Frenchmen in a clumsy sailing packet came along and went into the wind, and gaped at me in amazement.

"The White Indian!" one of them exclaimed, while the sail flapped impatiently against the stub of a mast.

"I was beginning to think you had lost your tongues," I replied. "I am bound for Biloxi. Can you give me a tow?"

They exchanged quick glances, and the elder of the two bowed most graciously and insisted:

"Better than that, monsieur. The pirogue will annoy you. Make it fast for a tow, then come aboard and take your pleasure decently."

The byplay of their eyes had not escaped me; nor did I doubt they had been ordered to watch for my coming. It mattered nothing, however, so long as I wished to make Biloxi. The boat would be more comfortable, and if they were secretly delighted to serve their master, I too, could rejoice at being relieved from the exertion of paddling the heavy pirogue the full distance.

So we set off, contented and gay, the two of them singing snatches of chansons which invariably reflected some amorous sentiment. Between these bits of sentiment they asked me polite questions about the upper river. It was plain that word had been passed along the river to watch for and report my presence. Joe Labrador had said the very huts at New Orleans were ready to "gobble" me up. The nearer I drew to Biloxi the more sharp set would I find this disposition to be.

"What is the latest news, my friends?" I finally managed to ask as their chattering queries slowed down.

"A wife-ship comes to Biloxi. We hurry home," said the younger man with a snicker.

"Silence, Basile," sternly rebuked the other. "Monsieur, the White Indian, we are Jules and Basile Mattor, father and son. What the boy says is true; a wife-ship comes. It is bad for man to live alone." And he fetched a deep sigh.

"The Company of the Indies has listened to his excellency's advice and will send no more wantons across the ocean," babbled the young man.

"Silence, child!" commanded the father. "Yes, monsieur, the White—"

"Monsieur Mattor, I am William Brampton," I broke in.

"Monsieur Brampton, I am more glad to meet you than you can know. As the boy says, this wife-ship will be filled with honest women. Women one can love and cherish, and take pride to show to one's friends. Good cooks, good—"

"But what of the news?" I interrupted.

Mattor pere drew a long face and mournfully replied:

"The last trade law goes bad with us. As for that all our trade laws are bad. To get supplies we must go to Mobile, Pensacola or Massacre island (the old name for Dauphine island, so called from the mounds of human bones found there). For delivery at la Nouvelle Orleans we must pay five per cent extra, twice that if delivered at Natchez, and 13 per cent—ah, mon Dieu! How that extra premium does climb up—at the Yazoo."

I suppressed a smile to hear how foolishly the Company of the Indies was playing into English hands. It would be hard enough for them to hold their trade without penalizing their customers. The directors of the company could never comprehend that to succeed it must encourage the colonists to work for themselves. "Work for us," was their motto. Mattor ran on:

"But that is not the worst, Monsieur Brampton. If we would trade we must send our products to la Nouvelle Orleans, Biloxi, Ship island, or Mobile. And first-grade tobacco can bring only 25 livres the hundred, rice 20 livres the hundred, the best wheat flour 15 livres, and a livre for a deerskin—think of it!"

"It is hard to be a planter here," I agreed. "Now in Carolina—but I cannot return there."

"We understand monsieur's very sensible emotion. Monsieur cannot return there," said Jules.

His expression and bearing were simplicity itself; his words contained a veiled threat.

"Bah! Who cares?" I cried. "Not I. I have lived in the woods so long I am known as the White Indian. I will never be cooped up in a settlement again, even if free to come and go as I pleased. All I wish now is to find Sieur de Bienville."

"Then you will go to Ship island, for his excellency went there this morning to await the coming of the wife-ship," said Jules.

I rolled my robes in a pillow and stretched out in the bow and fell asleep almost at once. When I awoke it was to see the stars overhead. I slept again, and on my second awakening found we were behind Ship island and making for the anchorage on the north side, where the masts of a ship were silhouetted against the morning sky. As I surveyed the Bay of Biloxi, the islands, and the main, I could not blame Bienville for his impatience with the government for insisting on a gulf port. Shoaling of the port on Dauphine had driven the seat of government from Mobile to Biloxi, but those who dwelt in Biloxi learned that the reflection from the sand was evil to endure, and that boats left unused were soon destroyed by the worms.

However, it was the unloading of the cargo-ships that supplied the last word in waste and inefficiency. Vessels from France must stop at Ship island, nearly 15 miles from the settlement. The cargoes were transferred to packet boats which were met by small boats when two or three miles from shore. Nor was this the end of landing the goods, for the small boats in turn took the sand a musket-shot from shore, and their loads were brought in by men, or by carts on high wheels. All this fuss and bother was enough to drive a practical mind to frenzy. When immigrants are substituted for barrels and bales one can easily imagine the confusion and dismay of the newcomers.

I had seen them huddled together without shelter, without food, homesick, starving and dying, while Bienville worked most desperately to distribute them up and down the river.

At that time I stood in high feather with the governor, having accompanied him and his axmen the previous winter to New Orleans. But I had never been on Ship island when immigrants were arriving. As it was part of my business to learn the kind of men and women, as well as the number, the company was sending over, I was glad the governor was at the island, as otherwise I might not have been allowed to go there.

A priest at Kaskaskia had told me on the down-trip that the reckless shipping of convicts and fallen women had been ordered stopped, and that a more desirable class of home-makers were coming to the valley. The more desirable they were the more aroused the Atlantic provinces would become.

"I have some hard Sapnish money for you, Monsieur Mattor," I remarked as I sat upright.

"God hear me! But hard money is a fairy hard to catch, now that Monseigneur L'as has covered the world with his paper money!" exclaimed the father.

The very packet seemed to sniff the prospect at silver and leaped more buoyantly through the shallow waters.

At Ship island, where the boats anchored—the Mattors called it Isle Francoise—there was twenty feet of water. As we drew nearer we saw the ship was discharging merchandise, while men and women were roaming about in all directions, receiving their first impressions of the new world.

"Land me near the ship. I'll hunt the governor afoot," I said.

We ran into a cove near the ship and I tossed Jules some silver pieces, which he kissed enthusiastically and then hid in his clothes.

"It's the Maire," cried Basile, his eyes lighting with boyish interest. "I saw her last season when she came in to Dauphine with the warship Africaine. They were bringing blacks from the Guinea coast. Faugh! A sweet-smelling ship for the ladies!"

"And they are ladies!" cried Jules. "I see one in black who walks like a queen. Wives for some of us. First come, first served!"

And with that he leaped ahead of me and raced up the beach in his haste to present Basile with a stepmother.

It was not until clear of the Maire, which the immigrants seemed to shun, that I sensed the confusion of the scene and observed the amazement and despair of the newcomers. A sergeant, tanned as dark as a Guinea black, was unusually active in pulling and pushing the immigrants about. In disgust I watched this fellow, his dirty paws making too free with the women, and then had my ire aroused by beholding him seize a woman in black by the arm—the one Mattor said walked like a queen—and give her a spin that sent her reeling across the sand to fall at my feet.

"Tonnerre de Dieu!" I found myself shouting as I sprang between the brute and the poor thing. "Are these people here for punishment, or to build a new world?"

"Ten million devils! Who are you to interfere with Sergeant Suarez, twenty years in the marines, when he is doing his duty?"

"Never mind who I am. Leave the woman alone."

He crouched for a spring, his eyes glaring like a tree-cat's, and I was ready for him, when to my surprise the rage died out of his face. His dark countenance began twisting up like old parchment. "God is good!" he whispered exultingly. "That brown beard! That big nose! Broil me and boil me if it isn't the White Indian! He! Ho!"

"The White Indian, yes. What of it, you nimblejack?"

"No, no," he softly cried. "I shall not be drawn into a quarrel with monsieur. He is game for my betters. Ah! But this rare news. I leave you to console the wench, monsieur, while I go to tell his excellency."

And off the rascal ran.

I turned to help the woman to her feet, but she was already erect, a slim figure in black, the somber tone of her attire being accented by the mass of yellow hair and the clear ivory pallor of her features. And as I gazed I found myself thinking that the hardships of the voyage had left her all eyes. Several women, attracted by the scene, laughed raucously; and a glance told me Bienville's insistence that decent women only be sent had not been heeded. I would have turned away if not for the unspoken appeal in the oval face of the sergeant's victim.

"I have not thanked you, monsieur," she whispered.

"Nor shall you. I did nothing. But you are ill, mademoiselle."

"A hunter bargaining for a wife!" shrilly screamed a wanton. "They swim out to meet us. Don't waste time on that sniveling thing, my big man."

The woman in black was shrinking from her mates, and well might she, as with foul abuse they upbraided her for trying to "steal the first proper man." There was death in her face as the torrent of filth was loosed, and I would have retreated to save her something of embarrassment had not the Mattors now come up to be instantly pounced upon by the harpies.

Well, the hero has met the heroine. Who and what is she?

Faithful to His Trust

While attending his sheep on the downs of Pyecombe, near Brighton, George Pearce, an elderly shepherd, tripped over a rut and broke a bone in his leg, says the South Wales News in a recent issue.

His cries for help having passed unheeded, he determined to round up his sheep before seeking aid for himself.

With the aid of his dog he drove them into a pen and fixed several hurdles to prevent their escape.

Then, limping in great pain, he carried three bags of fodder, which he put in the troughs for the lambs.

Having made certain that his charges would not suffer, Pearce limped over rough ground to his cottage, nearly two miles away, and there collapsed at the door.

Pride in Work

Whatever be the conditions which surround you in your work, do it with high thought and noble purpose. Do not whine and complain because of your unhappy lot; but accept it, humble and obscure as it may be, knowing that it is possible to clean out a gutter with the self-respecting dignity of manhood or to blacken a shoe with the enthusiasm of religion.—Hugh O. Experiments in California to ascertain if the cheaper thin-walled arch dam is better than the more expensive gravity structure indicate that the engineering descendants of the man who wanted but a lever and a place on which to stand to move the world now only ask for an opportunity to prove that they can heat, light and transport the world by water power.

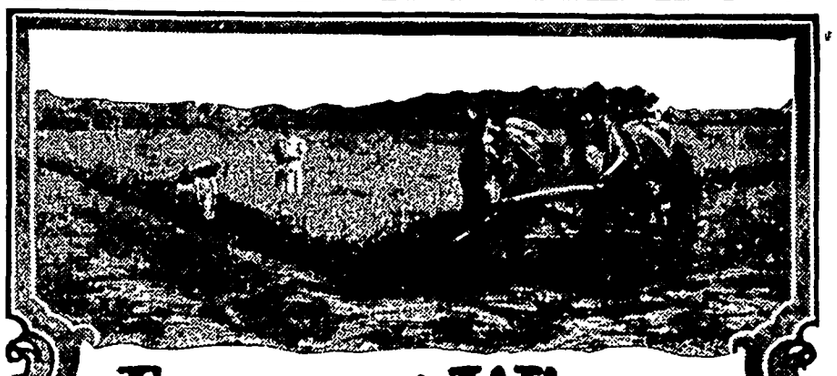
Some men are proud of having descended from their ancestors, others boast of having risen above them.

Romans Leave Off Singing?

Romans no longer sing, complains a writer in the Rome Messagero. There was a time, not long ago, when one might hear a carpenter pounding nails to the tune of "Funiculi" and a street cleaner chanting "Sole Mio" over his refuse. Rome, which is trying hard to become a cosmopolitan capital like Paris and Berlin, appears to be paying the price.

Any man who can make money can make friends, but he can't always keep either.



Farmers' Wives are Happy in Canada

RURAL life in Canada appeals to the women folk. Schools and churches abound. The educational needs of the children are fully met. The standards of social life are high. American women find conditions in Canada all that could be desired for the upbringing of their families. The wives of American farmers who cross the imaginary line for the greater opportunities of newer, richer, cheaper land in this neighbor country become enthusiastic over Canada.

"We have found farming very good in this part. The land is very fertile—the best I have seen." So writes Mrs. Alda Levasseur, of Arborfield, Sask.

Mrs. S. L. Harris, of Crossfield, Alberta, has this to say: "This district is especially noted for oats, barley and rye, but it seems that farmers are going in more and more every year for wheat growing. Dairy cattle, hogs and poultry all do well here, and I don't think a farm is complete without them. My husband and I have always liked this country very much. We first came to this district in 1903, and have never known a failure. Anyone who is willing to work can certainly do more than make a living here. In 1915 we decided we would like a change, and went to Michigan, but we were glad to return in 1919."

Be Independent in Canada

The certainty of agricultural prosperity awaits you in Canada. Land is cheap—virgin soil on which the world's finest hard wheat can be raised—$15 to $20 per acre! (Free homesteads still available further back).

Canada wants more good farmers who will grow wealthy and independent. The Government of Canada stands ready to assist as well as welcome you and your family and neighbors. A simple explanation of this practical help is included in the information that will be forthcoming without charge or obligation if you write to the nearest salaried official of the Government of Canada. Write at once, thereby doing the whole family a good turn.

OWN FOLKS' LEGEND IS OLD FAVORITE

Really Survival of Longing for Clan Identity.

Here is the favorite American legend of ancestry:

"There were three brothers of my family who came to this country; one settled in (say) Massachusetts, one in New York, and one in Virginia."

It is fairly safe to say that seven out of ten persons are firm believers of this legend, particularly those who are not able to tell who their great-grandfathers were.

Now suppose we consider the likelihood or unlikelihood of this legend.

First, we note that the brothers are always three in number They are never two, a much more likely happening Nor ever four or five; always just three. Now, is it likely that the pioneer ancestors of seven out of ten persons were just three brothers?

Secondly, we note that these three settled in three then widely separated colonies—separated widely not only in point of travel, but in social customs, characteristics and means of making living, to say nothing of religious likelihood of such a step in seven out of ten is clear when brothers come over now—if they do. They stick together and make for a spot where there are others like them in calling, in speech, in customs

In these days America is all one people, one country, and easy to get about in But in those days there were no Americans (except the Indians); there were scattered settlements of varying nationalities, hundreds of miles apart. And settlers then feared to go far, not only because they were new to the land, but it was new to everybody else.

So much for the likelihood or unlikelihood of the legend. Now for recorded facts.

Henry R. Stiles, one of the most eminent of American genealogists, puts it thus: "It is perfectly wonderful what a vitality this 'three brothers' story has among people. Yet it is now an almost proven fact that among the thousands of early immigrants of the Colonial period such cases could be easily numbered on the fingers of one pair of hands."

How did such tradition originate? Doubtless in the nature of the human mind The mind of man must have an explanation for new facts. Perhaps 100 years ago some one in Massachusetts learned that there were people of his name in Virginia, and possibly in New York. "Same name! Must be some of our folks!"

It is that "must be," so strong in its longing for tribal or clan identity, that by the next generation became a family tradition of fact For a tribal or clan feeling has been one of man's strongest characteristics for thousands of years

And the three is but the ages-old number number with which man endows the unknown and the mysterious, as the three Wise Men of the East, or the three of Gotham, to the three and the 33 degrees in freemasonry.—The Globe

Cholera Follows Drought

Recent droughts in the interior of China have brought epidemics of cholera according to information received here A hundred deaths a day for almost a week are reported from Changsha Hunan province, and the outbreak shows no sign of diminishing. From Zoucheo district of Hunan 1,500 deaths have been reported, with fatalities recorded in Siangtan and Changcheohsien The Chinese Red Cross in those areas is doing what it can to relieve the situation but the task is almost insurmountable With the epidemic exists a state of dire famine and thousands are suffering. Crowds of refugees are flocking to the towns, carrying their bundles and belongings. As fast as they reach the refugees the officials pack them on the cars—open trucks—and send them to Shanghai and other ports.

Forest Turned to Stone

The most marvelous petrified forest known to man has been found by two geologists in a remote valley of the Big Bend region nearly 100 miles from the nearest railroad at Marathon, Texas. Petrified tree trunks of 100 to 150 feet were found standing, and timbers of a size, diameter and length unparalleled in the world, that had fallen. One of these was 896 feet long. The valley in which this stone forest was found is split by a deep canyon. Its surface is covered by a thick layer of volcanic ashes which evidently came from a long extinct peak in the neighboring Chisos mountains, but long after the forest had passed into its petrified state. We haven't yet learned all there is to know about the land in which we live. —Capper's Weekly

Off to the Front

He was a splendid figure as he stood there in the hallway, his rifle slung over his shoulder, his automatics strapped tightly around his waist, and his bag of hand grenades in his hand.

His wife and children clung tearfully to him as he tried to comfort them. "Fear not," he said, "I'll return." But in his heart he knew the dangers that awaited him.

"I'll call you up at noon," he said, tearing himself away, "and let you know if I'm alive."

The door slammed. The wife stood tragically alone in the hallway. The jeweler had gone to his day's work.—Life.

Dreadful Sound Is Scream of Dog-Fox

A few times in a lifetime one may hear a fox scream, probably the most sinister, unearthly wild animal note that can be heard in North America. The howl of the wolf and the screech of the wildcat are all weird sounds, to say nothing of the dreadful shriek which the great horned owl sometimes gives, but none of them begin to be so fearsome as the scream of a dog-fox. The sound is so rare and dreadful as that screech of the wounded horse which frightened even Hawkeye and Chingachuck.

I once heard the sound in Cornwall, Conn., one frosty evening in the fall of 1919. Although I was indoors at the time, the scream brought me to my feet with every muscle tense, even though I recognized almost immediately what it was. If there ever was a sound which is the essence of pure horror it is the scream of a fox.

The last time I heard one perform was a year or so ago. A number of us were stopping at a camp built in a pine grove near the river. After supper a friend and myself followed a dim path through the woods to a bluff above the stream which showed a dusky silver among the deep lavender shadows. As we walked, the white mist met us like a ghost and below we could hear the faint splash of the deer crossing the stream.

Then, so distant that it sounded like a pin-point of sound pricked through the silence, came the hoot of a great horned owl, with its double second note as he hunted here and there for rabbits among the scrub oaks. Suddenly, the silence was broken by a perfectly appalling scream, coming through the darkness from the farther bank of the river

My companion, although a veteran naturalist, gripped my arm so tightly that his finger-prints showed black against the skin next day. He claimed afterward that he only did so to call my attention to the sound—a quite unnecessary proceeding.—Samuel Scoville, Jr., in the Forum.

Soul Can Be Measured

Out in the forest of Coye, in France, a distinguished mathematician worked in a lonely laboratory with delicate instruments measuring, year after year, and calculating to the millionth part of a centimeter The other day he appeared at the Sorbonne and made an announcement that caused as tremendous a sensation in France as if a bomb had been exploded. For Prof. Charles Henry declared that the human soul—that mysterious thing that is not a thing, which man has accepted only through faith—now can be measured. It is the first time, says Popular Science Monthly, that science ever has admitted tangible proof of the soul's existence.

Religion is right, declared Professor Henry. We never completely die. There is a certain electrical radiation or "biological vibration" that goes on and on. Set free by death, it seeks another envelope or body, because only by doing so can it establish its equilibrium.

Scientists today have ways of measuring the radiation of all substances. Yet after calculating the radiation in a body due to heat, that due to electromagnetic elements and that due to the attraction of the earth, they find there is still some unknown force that is none of these. It is this elusive force that Professor Henry identifies as the soul.

Wanted Full Praise

Here is a story that is going the rounds in New York city: The chef to M. Ignace Paderewski receives almost as much publicity en tour as does the pianist; partly because he is a good chef, and partly because he insists that the world be made aware of his genius. To this his master assents. Anything for peace and shelter from the run of table food of the railroad diner. More, M. Paderewski makes a point of complimenting his chef frequently. "Tell the chef," he said, lately, upon conclusion of a meal, "that the fish was marvelous, the roast superb, and the ice cream unsurpassable." The waiter relayed the message and returned, duly, with the answer. "The chef says," he told M. Paderewski, "that the soup was excellent, too."

Her Good Work Unseen

After 25 years in theatrical obscurity, Madame Lempereur has reached the top of her profession in Paris, but the public still will see nothing of her. Madame Lempereur is a theater prompter. She has been appointed to officiate at the Comedie Francaise, France's leading state theater, otherwise known as the House of Mollere. "A good prompter is as rare as an actor with talent," said Andre Antoine, manager of the Odeon, second state theater, where Madame Lempereur previously served. "Many's the time my old comrade has pulled me out of a hole. I was only free from anxiety when she was in the prompter's box."

"TURKEN" WAS BROUGHT TO U. S. FROM WEST INDIES

Recently there has come to public attention the so-called "turken," a feathered fowl, so its enthusiasts say, which combines the desirable qualities of the chicken and the turkey, and which is produced by cross-breeding chickens and turkeys.

Ever so often, says Dr. E. W. Lindstrom, head of gentics work at Iowa State College, this winged hybrid is brought to the front. Ever so often the curious public reads an announcement or an advertisement about it and eager "fans" rush to invest their honest dollars in flocks of these "wonder-working turkey-chicken fowls."

If the public wants to buy these creatures for what they are, well and good. If the public wants to buy them and pay a fantastic price for a fantastic fowl, well and good. But the public should know, contend the poultrymen, that it, in all scientific likelihood is buying just a fantastic fowl and not a cross between a turkey and chicken.

A turkey-chicken cross, provided there were such a thing, would be a generic cross, something in nature which only in rare instances ever happens, something as fantastic, for instance, as a cross between a horse and a cow.

Ever so often this turkey-chick cross has been widely heralded by a few enthusiastic fans who claim they have one or more or perhaps flocks of fowls, but always upon investigation, it has been found that these fans obtained their original stock from some one else, who in turn procured it from some one else and this last some one else was generally in California, Hongkong or Borneo, or somewhere else equally inaccessible and of specific address unknown.

The alleged turkey-chicken hybrid, which is supposed to be a cross between the two fowls, in reality, says Mr. Lindstrom, is merely a bare-necked breed of chickens which has been brought here from the West Indies and has been exploited as some great, new and scientific achievement.

An Open Letter--

Conservative Investors and well conducted Banks and other Financial institutions have become so impressed with the fundamental safety and good earning power of Public Utility investments that they are now investing a large part of their funds in such Securites.

TheThe great expanson of the Public Utility business, particularly that of Electric Light and Power Companies, is at present offering most unusual opportunities to Investors who want the safety and dependable income that goes with this growing and positively necessary business, and so they are placing large amounts of money in the Securities of the Light and Power Companies while they still may do so on an attractive basis.

The Central States Electric Company is a Light, Power, and Gas Company, whose Securities are finding increasing favor with Banks and private Investors.

This is because of the excellent record of the Company over a period of years, and because of the very strong property equities and earning power back of its Securities.

The 7% Preferred Stock for example has applicable property value back of it that is equal to several times the outstanding shares while the dividends are protected by very much more in net earnings than the 7% divi-dends require.

Besides this unusual value the stock is exempt from Iowa Taxes, and is also free from the present Normal Federal Income Tax, and thus gives the Investor a 7% income while the stock can be had at its present price of $100 per share.

Naturally, an investment like this has a very good market, and the Company itself thinks so well of its own Securities that it maintains resale faciliies for its Shareholders, so that any investment in the Preferred Stock may be quckly turned into cash.

If you think an investment like this would interest you we would be very glad to send you a circular describing it fully.

Hoping to hear from you soon, we are,

Yours very truly,

Central States Electric Co.

100 STEERS GRIND OUT STORY

Are Preparing For Annual "Hey Day" In Ames April 21

Approximately 100 head of Herefords, two-year-olds, yearlings, and calves, are munching away daily in the feed lots at Iowa State College grinding out with their molars the story they will tell cattle feeders who make the pilgrimage to Ames for the annual "Hey Day" on Wednesday, April 21.

"Hey Day," the institution of the Iowa cattle feeders, is the clearing house where 1,500 livestock men gather annually to get the latest information and experimental data concerning the cattle feeding game.

All of the cattle in the 10 experimental lots this year are Herefords. They were shipped here from Folsam New Mexico, and were started n feed in December. When on April 21 their digestive systems complete the experiments they are now working on, the animals will have been on feeding tests for four months.

In other years, says John M. Evvard, chief in animal husbandry investigation, who is in charge of the "Hey Day" many feeders have gotten mixed up on their dates and have lost out on the cattle feeders roundup, but this year he hopes the cattle men will inscribe a flaming red circle around April 21 on their calendars.

In the establishment of the government of our great country, the ideals of the leading patriots at that time were incorporated.

Foremost among these patriots stood "The Father of our Country," George Washington.

In order that we preserve these ideals and enjoy a continuance of the prosperity as a result of this munificent government, our future citizenship must adopt and cultivate these same high ideals of patriotism.

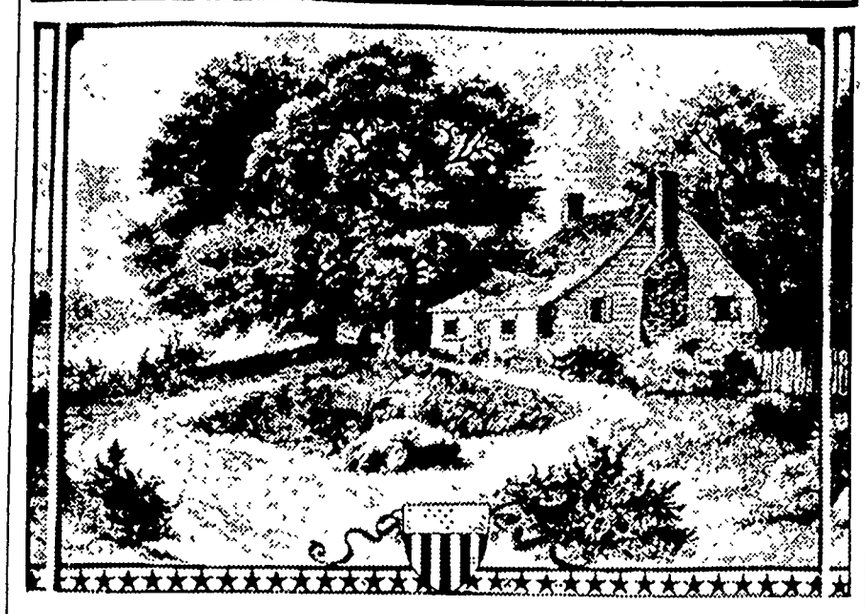
Birthplace of Washington



At this time all things reminiscent of the "Father of His Country" are more than passably interesting. This is an old and little known woodcut photo of Wakefield, Va., where George Washington was born.

To Restore Washington's Birthplace

The Wakefield National Memorial association, founded in 1923 in Washington for restoring the old "Washington homestead" to its original state, already has acquired 70 acres of this long-neglected site.

The plan of the association has been to restore and replace the Wakefield home in Westmoreland county to the state it was on February 22, 1732, when Washington was born.

The name, "Wakefield," which has so long been veiled in obscurity, the association points out, is destined to bring to the nation a new meaning when as a shrine it will be fittingly emphasized as the birthplace of the first President. During congressional hearings held for consideration of plans and authorization of adequate appropriations for the bicentennial celebration of the birth of Washington it was suggested that the observance should "begin at the beginning"—Wakefield

His Boyhood Home.

There at Wakefield, where much of the beautiful romance of Washington's boyhood was lived, is a spot where all Americans may do homage.

Referring to the visit of the Coolidge Presidential party to Wakefield, Dr. Charles Moore, chairman of the national commission of fine arts and a trustee of the Wakefield association, wrote:

"During his brief visit the President must have been depressed with conditions prevailing at a place so historic and at the same time so beautiful in itself. When he came to depart the ebbing tide made it impossible for a small boat to approach the shore; and the government wharf had long ago been so broken by the ice that it survives only as a melancholy and unsightly wreck. Therefore, the party was compelled to drive eight or ten miles to Colonial beach to board the Mayflower, the President's yacht. This was the best of an object lesson," concluded Doctor Moore.

Granite Shaft on Spot.

Going down the country road some forty miles below Fredericksburg and a half a dozen miles below the little settlement of Oak Grove, one notes at the left a small tablet inscribed, "This is Wakefield." Turning in, one traverses for a mile or two a road which was built through the combined efforts of the state of Virginia and the government, and comes out into a little clearing among the pines and cedars.

In the center of the knoll rises the granite shaft erected by the government.

The Potomac at Wakefield is some eight miles wide, and on the clearest days the trees on the Maryland shore appear only as a blue haze. No house is in sight from the monument site, although as a matter of fact several historic residences are not far away. Wakefield lies practically between Pope's creek and Bridge's creek.

Scene of Romance.

Washington's first romance occurred there, too. Betsy Fauntleroy, a "Lowland Beauty" who lived at Naylors Hold, fifteen miles from Wakefield, won his youthful affections. Proof of this is seen in a letter written by Washington to Betsy's father. It ran as follows:

"May 20, 1752.

To William Fauntleroy, Sr.

"Sir: I should have been down long before this, but my business in Frederick detained me somewhat longer than I expected and immediately upon my return from thence I was taken with a violent pleurice which has reduced me very low; but propose as soon as I recover my strength to wait on Miss Betsy in hopes of a revocation of the former cruel sentence, and see if I can meet with any alteration in my favor. I have inclosed a letter to her, which should be much obliged to you for the delivery of it, I having nothing to add but my best respts to your good lady and family.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON."

His "Lowland Beauty."

This letter resolves all doubt about the identity of the "Lowland Beauty," around whom has gathered so much sentimental mystery and interest. Gen. Fitzhugh Lee discovered this letter written after Washington's return from Barbadoes, March 4, 1752, so he must have received his "cruel sentence" from Miss Betsy before the voyage. September, 1751, which would make him nineteen years of age and the young lady sixteen. Thus it can be seen that Washington not only claimed Wakefield as his birthplace, but as the beloved spot of his boyhood and first love as well.

It is the ultimate purpose of the Wakefield association to buy the entire tract of 1,000 acres between Bridge's creek and Pope's creek, adjoining the 11¾ acres owned by the government. The association proposes to erect on or near the site of the Washington family home a copy of the original house, the foundations of which already have been traced.

Tablet in Honor of Washington's Brother

A bronze tablet in memory of Col. Charles Washington, founder of Charles Town, Va. (now West Virginia), in 1786, was unveiled at exercises in charge of Bee Line chapter, D. A. R., which erected the tablet in the historic courthouse at Charles Town, W. Va., last year.

Citizens and officers of the county gathered. Miss Frances D. Packette, fifth great-niece of Charles Washington, unveiled the tablet. Col. B. D. Gibson of Charles Town was master of ceremonies.

Col. Charles Washington, brother of George Washington, was born on May 2, 1738. He served under his brother, General Washington, in the Revolution, after which he returned to his estate in Berkeley county.

Washington's Courtesy

In that terrible winter at Valley Forge when the fortunes and the spirits of the American army were at their lowest ebb, there arrived at the camp a letter for Gen. George Washington, a letter containing a strange request. The writer, Miss Kitty Livingston, wanted to know if the general would send her a lock of his hair. General Washington forwarded the lock of hair, together with his compliments.

This human sidelight on George Washington was revealed recently when the original letter was read before the Mount Vernon Ladies' association. The letter was donated by Miss Margaret Norton and Miss Elizabeth Norton, great-granddaughters of Kitty Livingston. It reads:

"General Washington having been informed lately of the honor done him by Miss Kitty Livingston in wishing for a lock of his hair, takes the liberty of enclosing one accompanied by his most respectful compliments."

NEW TAX BILL IS PASSED BY SENATE

Reductions $125,000,000 Over Mellon Limit—Now Up to Joint Conference.

Washington.—The senate passed the tax reduction bill providing a saving of $456,000,000 in taxes this year to federal taxpayers, and sent it to conference for adjustment of differences with the house.

Passage of the bill, which came suddenly and somewhat as a surprise, even to senate leaders, is expected to assure benefits of the proposed tax cut in the payment of first income tax installments on March 15.

The vote was 58 to 9.

Senators opposing the bill were: Frazier, North Dakota; LaFollette, Wisconsin; McMaster and Norbeck, South Dakota; Norris, Nebraska, and Nye, North Dakota, Republicans, and Shipstead, Farmer-Labor, Minnesota; and Reed, Missouri, and Wheeler, Montana, Democrats.

The senate accepted all reductions voted by the house and in addition slashed taxes by another $125,000,000.

The administration has declared the extent of reduction provided by the bill excessive, but confidence was expressed at the White House that the measure, as finally drafted by the conference committee, would lower the total cuts to within limits acceptable to President Coolidge.

Not more than a week is expected to be taken by the conferees in reaching a compromise, after which the senate and house must ratify the agreement before the bill is sent to the White House for the signature of the President.

Thirty-four Republicans and 24 Democrats voted for the measure, while six Republicans, two Democrats and the one Farmer-Labor member opposed it.

The main changes made by the senate in the house bill were:

Repeal of the inheritance tax.

Repeal of the taxes on automobiles, admissions and dues.

Increased reduction in the surtax rate applying on incomes between $24,000 and $100,000, involving an additional saving of $23,000,000 on these taxes.

Repeal of the capital stock and the 1 per cent increase in the present 12½ per cent corporation tax.

Increased reductions in the stamp and cigar taxes.

Both the senate and the house agreed on the following general provisions which are sure to become law:

Repeal of the law allowing publication of the amounts of income tax payments.

An increase in the personal exemptions from the income tax from $1,000 to $1,500 for single persons and from $2,500 to $3,500 for married persons, which will relieve 2,300,000 federal taxpayers of all taxes.

Reduction of the normal income tax rates from 2 to 1½ per cent on the first $4,000 of taxable income; from 4 to 3 per cent on the next $4,000, and from 6 to 5 per cent on the remainder.

Reduction in the maximum surtax rate of 40 per cent applying on amounts of income in excess of $500,000, to 20 per cent on the amounts of income in excess of $100,000, with corresponding reductions on the lower rates of the graduated surtax schedule which now starts at 1 per cent at $10,000.

An increase from $10,000 to $20,000 in the amount of income which the 25 per cent reduction on account of "earned income" may be applied.

Repeal of virtually all of the miscellaneous excise and occupational levies.

Northwestern May Soon Take Over Omaha Line

New York.—Decision on the application of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway company to acquire control of the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha railway will be made public by the interstate commerce commission within the next few days.

It is expected the application will be approved. It will form one of the first railroad consolidations to be authorized by the commission. A total of 10,212 miles and a capitalization of $502,768,030 is involved.

The offer by the Chicago & Northwestern management to exchange its stock for that of the Omaha on the basis of three shares of Northwestern common for two shares of Omaha preferred, and five shares of Northwestern common for seven shares of Omaha common was made January 13, 1925.

The Omaha gives the Northwestern an entrance into Minneapolis, St. Paul and Duluth, and will furnish important traffic in coal and iron ore.

SPRING HATS REVEL IN COLOR; TIE-COLLARS GIVE CHIC TOUCH

SILK patchwork has become part of the mode's trimming scheme for this season. Will wonders ever cease! Not only our hats but also our gowns are made ornate with gay bits of silk and velvet which are actually patched together in a manner which, it must be confessed, bears a striking resemblance to the "crazy quilt" work of bygone days. However, it were best not to give voice to such a suggestion, for if you should, your milliner or your dressmaker will take opportunity to inform you in most convincing tones that that which you make so bold as to call patchwork is, in truth, modernistic art applied to apparel design.

This method of combining bits of fabric of every hue bids fair to become a widespread vogue. The little hat shown first in the group here pictured gains its dash of color in the "patchwork" design which embellishes crown and brim.

French milliners are sending over some lovely spring hats featuring geometrical patterns worked of ribbon or fabric. The color effect is sometimes bizarre, other times a symphony of pastel harmonies. A geometrical pattern which uses two pastel colors, opal gray with cyclamen pink, is expressed in the very choice belting ribbon hat illustrated last in the picture.

Answering to the call for high color in spring millinery is the model pictured to the center-left. Several sections of taffeta silk in various exquisite tints combine to form a soft drape covering the hat foundation. Appliqued on this silken background is an immense embossed flower. These embossed applique motifs are very smart. They come in single large flowers with foliage, as the picture shows, or in tiny wreaths, festoons and bouquets. Some of the latest pastel felt hats have these colorful floral pieces appliqued effectively in band effects or covering partially the side crown or brim. The effect is that of hand painting.

The charming chapeau to the right at the top demonstrates how abundantly handiwork is applied in some instances. This elegant felt, which is in that always attractive parme-violet coloring, is profusely stitched with silver thread, the motifs showing mother-of-pearl hudes together with silvery tones.

Finishing the neckline of a frock is usually a perplexing matter to the woman who is trying her skill at home dressmaking. Now that scarf and tie-collars have come to the rescue, the difficulty of accomplishing a becoming and stylish effect is met.

The subject of scarf or tie-collars is a very comprehensive one, for it includes everything from the simple long streamers (made of the same material as the blouse or dress) which bands the neckline, tying tight in choker fashion, to the most picturesque types which show knotted kerchief effects, somewhat similar to the charming necktie and collar in the illustration herewith.

Very effective on cloth or crepe frocks of solid colorings are kerchiefs of plaid silk tied cowboy fashion. Another interesting development along these lines of graceful neck finishings is the scarf matching the dress, yet entirely detached. This is wrapped close about the throat, the ends falling one to the back the other to the front from the shoulder.

The fashion for tie-collars started in very simple form, but the new frocks give notice that flattering attention is being given to all sorts of collars which tie and knot in most youthful fashion.

A popular method of adjusting long ties is to bring them from under a collar or as part of the collar itself, to the front, where the ends are drawn through finished slots cut in the dress or blouse. The mode is trending to exaggerated lines in that not infrequently these long streamers, not of ribbon but of the dress fabric, fall not only to the edge of the skirt but below it.

Many of the modish tweed coats have scarf collars lined with a pastel-colored flannel. The new low tie-collar invites the wearing of tailored vestees of silk or satin, or chemisettes of fine lingerie and also of choice lace.

With low-necked evening frocks matching scarfs are wound close about the throat, the wide graceful ends fancifully trimmed.

DR. W. B. CALDWELL
AT THE AGE OF 83

Constipation! How to Keep Bowels Regular

To Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, it seemed cruel that so many constipated men, women, children, and particularly old folks, had to be kept constantly "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

While he knew that constipation was the cause of nearly all headaches, biliousness, indigestion and stomach misery, he did not believe that a sickening "purge" or "physic" was necessary.

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin he discovered a laxative which helps to establish natural bowel "regularity" even for those chronically constipated. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin not only causes a gentle, easy bowel movement but, best of all, it never gripes, sickens, or upsets the system. Besides, it is absolutely harmless, and so pleasant that even a cross, feverish, bilious, sick child gladly takes it.

COUNTY SPELLING CONTEST

Conducted By The Des Moines Register; At Garner March 27th

Both town and rural schools in Hancock County are highly enthusiastic about the County Spelling Contest which will be held in Garner on the afternoon of March 27th. The winner in this contest will represent Hancock County in the state contest to be held in Des Moines in April. The State contest is being conducted by the Des Moines Register and the county contest will be governed by the rules sent out by the Register.

The primary object is to create efficiency in spelling. We believe the greatest benefit to all will be attained by each school holding its local contest just before the county one in March, keeping the boys and girls all spelling until time for the contest.

If there is a school that has not entered, begin today. We have some extra lists of words and rules that we will send if requested.

Some fine township contests have been held and more are being planned. These offer a splendid opportunity for the boys and girls to become familiar with the conditions under which a contest is held. The winner in the township has no official standing, each school is entitled to a representative in the county contest. In some parts of the county the farm bureau has given splendid co-operation in this movement and have given prizes to the winners. If a township contest is wanted the county superintendent will be glad to help plan for one.

700 ACRES PRODUCES 2,500,000 BUSHELS CORN

Fairview Farm, the name given the Adams tract of 7,000 acres near Odeboldt, Sac County, produced 2,500,000 bushels of corn in 1925. Fifteen corn husking machines, each drawn by a tractor, were used in harvesting it. Until last fall mules have furnished the motive power. The big farm is owned by W. P. Adams, of Chicago, after whom the old Adams Express company was named, and is managed by his son, R. B. Adams of Odeboldt. The farm was originally known as the Hiram Wheeler ranch, the former owner being a candidate for governor of Iowa at one time but was defeated by Horace Boies.

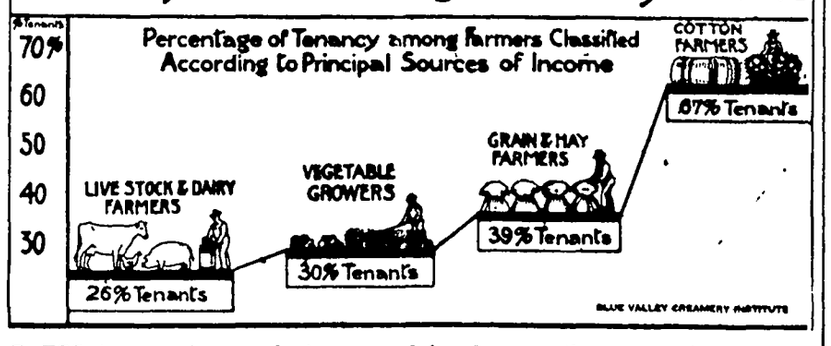
Most Dairymen Own Farms, Tenancy Survey Reveals



LESS tenancy is prevalent among dairy farmers than any other type of farmer, is the declaration of the Blue Valley Creamery Institute after a complete study of the percentage of tenancy among farmers classified according to the principal sources of income based upon Census Bureau reports. One alarming element of the survey is that farm tenancy is increasing out of proportion to the total number of farms. According to the census of 1880, 25.6 per cent of all the farms were operated by tenants; in 1890, 28.4 per cent; in 1900, 35.3 per cent. During these forty years the total number of farms increased 61 per cent, while the number of tenant farmers jumped 139.6 per cent. The total number of farms operated by owners only showed a gain of 33.8 per cent. Cotton farming leads in the percentage of tenancy, the Institute finds, because of the large number of "croppers." The percentage is also high in the case of other cash crops, which require only a limited investment. The short term leases do not permit the tenant to engage in dairy, live stock or fruit farming to advantage. And the cream cow is, after all, the greatest friend that the tenant farmer can tie to. She produces ready cash regularly every week. The larger investment also is a handicap, as the tenant usually has only a limited amount of capital. In live stock and dairy farming long-term leases are required.

Idle Hour Theatre To Open Under New Management

MOVING PICTURE SHOW TO BE OPENED IN KLEMME AGAIN

Mr. A. F. Lebeck Will Open Up First Class Movie Show; First Show Will Be Given Sat. Eve

The Idle Hour Theatre, which has been closed several months for lack of a management, will again be opened for entertainment Saturday of this week.

The new concern which will operate the theatre will be known as the Klemme Moving Picture Company, and Mr. A. F. Lebeck, of Eldora will manage the business.

Wants The People To Be Satisfied

Mr. Lebeck intends to run only the best pictures he can obtain. He says he wants to run the class of pictures that the people want, and that he is going to do his best to please all who attend his shows.

May Run Shows Every Night

If the people turn out good and the prospects look good, he will later run the show every night. But to do this he must have a liberal patronage and a full house.

Many Klemme people have been in the habit of going to Garner, Belmond, Clear Lake, and other nearby towns to see good movie shows. Mr. Lebeck stated that he is going to run a high class show so that no one needs to go away from Klemme to get good entertainment. Another thing: he tells us that his prices are going to be low enough so that everyone can well afford to take in a good show occasionally.

Lets Boost For The Movies

Klemme needs a good moving picture show, that's been a felt need since the theatre closed. Klemme can have a good movie show. It's up to the business men and the people of Klemme and vicinity to patronize the movie if we are to have a first class show, at least every Wednesday and Saturday night.

Mr. Lebeck is a new man in this town, but he wants to get acquainted and above all he wants the people to tell him what kind of pictures are best liked and he will try to arrange his programs to satisfy all.

Thee ditor of an exchange says he can nearly always tell a woman who has a "party line" telephone n he home. As a rule her left ear is as flat as a pancake. She has ironed all the wrinkles out of it listening to the conversation of other parties along the line.

DOINGS OF THE WEEK REPORTED BY THE LOCAL SCHOOL

KLEMME HIGH SCHOOL ORCHESTRA TO GIVE CONCERT

Orchestra Has Developed Into Real Musical Organization Under Direction Of Gary

The Klemme High School Orchestra is working hard on a concert to be given in April. Each member of the orchestra is putting in at least a half hour a day in individual practice besides the two group rehearsals a week. The selections to be played are all standard and classical compositions and, among others, the following well known composers will be represented: R. Wagner, Joh. Brahms, Gounod, Edward Macdowell Gabriel Marie, Fritz Kreisler, Joh Strauss and B. Goddard.

Most people do not appreciate the difficulties one encounters in attempting to direct a group of High School musicians. In the first place one has no choice in selecting the instrumentation in order to have a properly balanced group. If most of the instruments are brass and there are only a few strings one has to take them as they are. All of the better tpye of music has solo parts which cannot be left out, written in for at least one or two of the following instruments: Clarinet, Flute 'Cello, Horns and Oboe. It is necessary to cue in or write over parts in all f these places. One finds then that it is very difficult to select music that is of the better type and is still adapted to any given group of players. One encounters these difficulties even if each member of the group can skillfully handle his or her instrument which is never the case in a High School group. In all standard and classical music one finds the violin parts written in the upper positions as well as the first and to be able to execute this in the proper manner one must spend ears of patient study and practice besides paying for expensive instruction There are a great many difficulties which one encounters in ensemble playing which is hard enough to contend with even if everyone in the group is a professional musician so taht it is easy to see that the group as a whole cannot possibly play any better than each of the members can play alone. Nevertheless, the Klemme High School Orchestra is trying its best to give the people of Klemme and vicinity something really worth while and are hoping for their support when the time comes to present their concert.

DOROTHY RIDDER MARRIED AT WATERTOWN, SOUTH DAK.

Miss Ridder Is Well Known In This City; Was Married Feb. 13

At a simple marriage ceremony at the parsonage of the Methodist Episcopal church last Saturday afternoon Miss Dorothy Ridder, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Calhoun The couple were attended by Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Youngren with the bride's two brothers, Homer and Gayle Ridder, also witnesses of the ceremony.

Both young people are widely known and popular in the younger set in Watertown. The bride has lived in Watertown for seventeen years, receiving her grade and high school education here and completing a course at the South Dakota School of Business prior to acepting a position as bookkeeper at the Citizens National bank where she has been employed for over a year. HANCOCK COUNTY BASKET BALL TOURNAMENT AT BRITT FRIDAY NIGHT

Klemme Has Lost But Three Games Out Of Fourteen played

Britt, Garner and Kanawha carried away the honors at the County Declamatory Contest last week at Britt. Beatrice Busch of Klemme won second place in her class.

We hope for better luck at Belmond this week.

This week ends the first six weeks period of the last semester and reports on work done by pupils may be looked for next week.

The work on a play by the P. T. A. has begun. Miss Abel has consented to do the coaching. The cast chosen is a good one and a fine program is expected.

Our High School Orchestra was asked to play at the Britt Declamatory Contest last week. We felt rather proud of their work and the quality of music rendered. They are at work at present on a public program to be rendered in a few weeks.

Klemme Wins Over Swaledale

Our basket ball team won their final game of those scheduled for the season at Swaledale last Friday night at Swaledale. Swaledale played a fast and furious game and had they been able to find the hop and sink the pill more often would have worried our boys more. It was a battle royal but it ended in our favor by a comfortable margin, 27 to 19. This makes eleven victories to but three defeats for the season, a commendable record.

At The County Tournament

The team will be at Britt on Friday night of this week where they will play the fast Kanawha team which has as good or possibly a better record. If our boys can win over Kanawha they feel they have good prospects of winning the tournament Let every man, woman, and child of Klemme drop their work and go to Britt Friday night and shout for their boys in this big game.

Corwith and Crystal Lake open the contest; Hayfield and Britt follow and Klemme and Kanawha close the first evening of the tournament. Garner drew a bye and will not play the first round. They will play the winners of the Klemme-Kanawha game on Saturday afternoon

Klemme Will Meet Hansel In First Round Of State Tournament At Mason City, March 5

We have just received word fro. Mason City and the pairings at the State Tournament there on Friday of next week. Klemme is scheduled to play the fast Hansel team there on Friday evening, at 7:00 o'clock Hansel has defeated several teams in Class A and should be pretty tough opponents. If our boys can defeat them they will deserve a lot of credit. But they must be in the best of condition to urn he trick We hope they succeed and can continue their playing on Saturday. We doubt if there are any faster teams to be played at Mason City in Class B.

Hope Klemme empties herself for the big game with Hansel on Friday eve., March 5th at 7:00 P. M.

Two brothers named Robinson residing on a farm over the line in Missouri, south of Centerville, while engaged in removing a stone wall from an old well, killed 136 snakes and when another part of the wall caved in there were so many reptiles that further work in the well was abandoned. The snakes were very much alive and ready for a fight. There were rattle snakes, spreading vipers, blue racers, garter snakes, bull snakes, in fact, all kinds that live in that part of the state. Dynamite will be exploded in the well before further work is attempted.

AGREE ON TAX CUT; TO PASS THIS WEEK

Slash O. K.'d by Both Houses Totals $381,000,000—In Effect Soon.

Washington.—The conference committee representing the senate and house have reconciled their differences and reached a complete agreement on the tax reduction bill. Approval of the compromise by both houses and by President Coolidge is assured and the bill will become a law in time to give taxpayers their reductions in taxes on 1925 income, the first installment of which is due March 15 next.

Hundreds of thousands of persons will be relieved of all income taxes under the new law, and those who will continue to pay will receive reductions ranging from 25 to 75 per cent.

The new bill affords taxpayers a saving of $381,000,000 on this year and $343,000,000 next year.

Outstanding features of the bill as agreed on by the conferees were:

It fixes normal taxes of 1½ per cent on the first $4,000 of taxable income, 3 per cent on income between $4,000 and $8,000 and 5 per cent on incomes above $8,000, as compared to the existing 2, 4 and 6 per cent rates.

It makes personal exemptions of $1,500 for single persons and $3,500 for married persons, as compared to existing $1,000 and $2,500. The increased exemptions relieve 2,350,000 persons of all federal taxes.

It grants a flat 25 per cent reduction of the net tax on earned income, with a maximum limit of $20,000 instead of the present $10,000.

It provides surtaxes ranging from 1 per cent at $10,000 to a maximum rate of 20 per cent at $100,000, as compared to the present law, which ranges from 1 per cent to a maximum of 40 per cent at $500,000 and over.

Theater admission tickets up to 75 cents were made tax exempt. The limit in the present act was 50 cents.

Automobile taxes were cut from 5 to 3 per cent.

It places the corporation earnings tax at 13 per cent on 1925 income, payable this year, divided as follows: Six and one-quarter per cent up to July 1 and 6¾ per cent from July to December. After this year the rate is to be 13½ per cent. The present law is 12½ per cent.

The capital stock and gift taxes were repealed.

Estate taxes begin at 1 per cent on estates of $100,000 in value, graduated up to 20 per cent on estates of $10,000,000 and over, with a credit of 80 per cent to them on taxes paid to the states.

The present law requires 1 per cent on estates of $50,000, graduated up to 4 per cent on estates of $10,000,000 and above, with a credit of 25 per cent.

The conferees adopted a retroactive feature applying the lower 1921 estate tax rates on all estates coming under the 1924 law.

The 25 per cent flat deduction allowed under the 1924 law was retained. This means rebates of many millions of dollars by the Treasury department.

Repeal of all income tax publicity effected by the senate and house was approved by the conferees.

Alcohol taxes were cut from $2.20 per gallon to $1.65, effective January 1, 1927, and to $1.10 effective January 1, 1928.

WANT MILLIONS FOR NAVAL AIR SERVICE

House Committee Puts O. K. on $85,078,000 Program.

Washington.—The house naval committee has given its approval to a five-year building program to cost $85,078,000 for the naval air service. It would become operative in the fiscal year beginning June 30.

The program, as recommended to the house, includes both heavier-than-air and lighter-than-air activities and by the end of the period would assure the service of 1,000 new airplanes and two dirigibles, each three times the size of the wrecked Shenandoah. The total cost of the two dirigibles would account for $8,000,000 of the total.

The committee also recommended an appropriation of $300,000 for the navy to contract with the Aircraft Development corporation, backed by Ford interests, for an all-metal airship. This would be in addition to the total carried in the program.

The amount proposed in the program would be in addition to the $3,300,000 carried in the navy bill to provide for 78 new planes during the next fiscal year. Coupling this amount with the $12,285,000 recommended in the program, a total of $15,585,000 would be available for the fiscal year 1927, to provide 313 new planes.

Thereafter the program would make the following apportionments.

1928—$16,223,000, providing 313 planes.

1929—$17,582,000, providing 335 planes.

1930—$18,941,000, providing 357 planes.

1931—$20,046,000, providing 374 planes.

This would give a total of 1,692 planes, including the 78 already provided for. Concurring with the statemen of Rear-Admiral William A. Moffett, naval air chief, that the efficient life of a plane was about three years, the committee estimates the strength of the air service in planes at the end of the period at 1,000.

MANY KILLED, HURT IN UTAH SNOWSLIDE

Thirty-Nine Bodies Recovered While Search Continues for Others.

Bingham, Utah.—Thirty-nine bodies of men, women and children have been removed from the mountain of snow which came tumbling down a few days ago on the Highland Boy mining camp in Sap Gulch, near here.

Rescue workers believe that there are fifteen or twenty more bodies buried under the tons of snow and ice that they may not be found until the spring thaw early in April.

Twelve injured persons, caught in the frail buildings when they were struck by the thundering mass of snow, are confined to hospitals and some of them are not expected to recover.

Officials directing the search of the scrambled ruins of a score of buildings, one a three-story frame rooming place housing 50 persons, expressed the belief that in the slide which buried seventy lives had been lost.

Frank A. Wardlaw, superintendent of the Utah-Delaware Mining company, which operates the Highland Boy workings, made up a list of the missing persons, which included the names of owners and lessees of houses destroyed. He was unable to say how many other persons might have been in the cabins, although it was believed that there were some aliens who were not employed by the mining company.

Only 18 of the known dead have been identified, and there was the possibility that the 17 unidentified bodies were those of persons listed as missing and believed dead.

The rescue workers, numbering more than fifty, were spurred in their attack upon the debris by the finding alive of Jimmy McDonald, his wife, owners of the boarding house, after more than fourteen hours' imprisonment under the wreckage. The McDonalds were brought out after hopes had been given up for them remaining buried.

The slide began two miles above the little settlement more than 8,000 feet above sea level in the Oquirrh mountains, when the freshly fallen snow slipped from its resting place from an earlier fall that had become packed. As it zig-zagged its way down the mountain it gathered momentum and speed. In its path of destruction for two miles the avalanche was at least 1,000 feet.

Two previous snowslides in Sap gulch each took tolls of three lives. One of these was in 1899, the other about six years ago.

Penal Island for Four Mexicans in Peteet

Tia Juana, Mexico.—Expiation for the deaths of the four members of the American Peteet family will send four Mexicans to the penal colony of Tes Marias. They are Antonio Llanos, deposed chief of police of Tia Juana; Louis Amador, fugitive from American justice and proprietor of a Tia Juana bar; Refugio Alvarez, bartender, and Francisco Gonzales, Tia Juana policeman.

The primary accusation against these men was murder, and the terms of banishment, if carried out, should range from six to twenty years, it is said. Federal Judge Kerr and A Martinez, territorial secretary of state for the northern district of Lower California, informed newspapermen that Llanos, Amador Alvarez and Gonzales are now held under unspecified accusations." They have the constitutional privilege of two weeks to submit a defense, and may demand a trial by nine men, of whom seven must convict.

The other prisoners, also accused of murder and other offenses in connection with the homicides of the four Peteets, were freed, but their movements will be under observation of the Tia Juana police for a certain period.

BIENVILLE

SYNOPSIS.—Traveling by canoe on the Mississippi, on his way to Biloxi, in the early days of the settlement of Louisiana, William Brampton, English spy, known to Indians and settlers as the "White Indian," sees a Natchez Indian post a declaration of war against the French. For his own purposes, he hastens to Biloxi to carry the news to Bienville, French governor. Brampton meets an old friend, Joe Labrador, Indian halfbreed, who warns him Bienville has threatened to hang him as a spy. Brampton refuses to turn back. He falls in with Jules and Basile Mattor, on their way to Biloxi to secure wives from a ship, the Maire, bringing women from France. At Biloxi Brampton protects a woman from a sergeant's brutality.

—3—

Will you walk to where the boats e, so you may go to the main?" I ked.

"God!" she shivered, staring fran-ally about. "To the main? To the lderness! To the savages! Any-ing to escape that!"

And her gaze followed the group of rlorn creatures now pawing and auling the two Mattors.

"My name is Brampton. I'm English. mething of an outlaw from Virginia. ou came to help make Louisiana eat?"

"I am Claire Dahlsgaarde. I've come die," she simply replied.

"You fear that they misrepresented nditions to you?"

She gave me a quick sidelong glance, sharp and penetrating as the point a needle, and with more control of r voice informed me:

"I was picked up in a raid."

My first thought was that she must the daughter of some poor farmer. or the company's agents in rounding the friendless to ship overseas had scruples in taking the daughters of ie poor, be they ever so virtuous. ut a glance at the slim white hands, aristocratic and so unused to labor, nt a chill to my heart. She was or, but no daughter of poor but hon-t people.

She had been picked up in a raid. hat was easily understood. But a oung woman with slim soft hands. ho had not worked. And yet there as infinite appeal in the small face nd silent grief. Her utter helpless-ss increased the inevitable suspicion. nyway, it was not for me to con-emn her.

I broke the silence by offering:

"I will walk with you to the shore nd see you start in one of the first oats."

Her head jerked up as I spoke, be-ause of some aloofness in my tone, I ear. I had not meant to be cruel, for e was heartsick and body-sick, a ry young woman as helpless as a hild, and marooned in a land which ust be to her a perpetual revelation horrors. "It will be good to go in e boat," she managed to say. "But rhaps not the first boat—it de-nds."

"It will largely depend on his excel-ncy's orders," I corrected.

"But they—the women—said there ould be much waiting. Too few boats I can tell better when I see them ading."

Here was fine picking and choosing r one of her world.

"Your name is not French," I re-arked for the sake of saying some-ing as we walked along the shore.

"Danish—I am Danish," she softly plied.

"And from Paris, or one of the vil-ges?"

"From Paris—last. I have no home nothing."

We were now on the outskirts of a nerous mob, where men and women ought to be first to leave the island. saw Bienville calmly directing his oldiers. One packet was filled and arting for the main. Another had ces for two or three, and Bienville an his cool gaze over the pushing, thing crowd. His eyes rested on a moment without a sign of ition; then his arm shot out nger pointed in my direction. voice rose above the confu-command:

woman back there. No; the lack. Come, mademoiselle."

aused for a moment and anx-xamined those aboard the boat, n glided forward without a a glance for me. There was otion behind me and a short f a man, who walked like a nd whose withered face de-long life—evilly spent if there ing in physiognomy—snarled nd with unexpected strength wo men and a woman from his his efforts to follow her. She e animal-like cry and turned and there was an awful horror in her gaze as she beheld the man; and her eyes sought mine and pleaded protection.

Instantly I knew she did not want this fellow to follow her. Intuition told me her fear of him was the reason she was unwilling to make for the boats until she had seen him depart, or knew he was left behind. Instinctively my long leg shot out and the toe of my moccasin caught his instep, and he was down on his face in the sand. By the time he scrambled to his feet she was in the boat and Bienville also was aboard. The governor was calling back to the sergeant:

"The others must wait till the next trip. Get them rations from the ship."

The boat drew away from the shore and the hideous little man was at my throat. I leaped back and he attacked for the second time. He had very long arms and one hand held a dirk. I guarded with the barrel of my musket and flung him back on the sand. This time he rose more slowly, his small, deep-set eyes glowing with murder as he took time to inspect me.

"That's much wiser," I told him. "Your voyage made you bloodthirsty."

"Drown me in bilge, but you're English!" he exclaimed, some of the malevolence leaving his puckered face. Then venomously: "Blast your eyes! You stopped me from making the main."

He stood with his long arms hanging limply at his sides, and I noticed the little finger on each hand was missing. He had the appearance of great age, and yet he had been as active as a monkey when he sought my throat.

"His excellency would have turned you back. The boat was filled. They haven't taken off all the women yet," I said.

"Women!" he chuckled, turning to three women who had been attracted by the scene.

The three lost their brazen boldness and shrank back from his leering gaze.

"Women!" he repeated. "I've seen 'em afloat, and I've seen 'em ashore. And the dear creatures always took kindly to old Bill Slasher."

"Old Six Fingers is your name," one cried, making the sign of the cross.

"You came over on the Maire?" I inquired.

"Aye, mate. Come because it was my choice. A man who sailed with Cap'n Davis and helped sack Pensacola in 'sixty-five ain't to be made to take any v'yages he don't fancy. I want to git ashore and hunt for some of them mines all England and France is talking about.

"Mines, mines!" yelled a clear voice; and a young man in tattered finery came rushing from the direction of one of the ponds, his yellow curls blowing in the breeze, his pale dissolute face redeemed by a whimsical smile.

"The mad Mississippian!" screamed one of the wenches, throwing herself in his path and clawing at his ragged cloak which he wore jauntily although the sun poured down terrific heat.

The fellow brushed her aside and stared at me, recognizing me as a stranger. Then arranging his cloak and tenderly caressing the broken plume in his cap he lustily began proclaiming:

"Behold a Mississippian. Who wants some Mississippi? Ten thousand shares at sixteen thousand livres a share! Who buys Mississippi? You, fair sir, with the chestnut hair and beard? Ten thousand shares at sixteen thousand livres! Who wants any Mississippi? The land discovered by Johnny L'as where silver is so plentiful it is only used in paving roads, where lumps of gold are strewn so thickly that no one cares to dig beneath the surface!"

Six Fingers crowded by me, his eyes wolfish with greed as he listened to this fantastic harangue, just as he must have listened to it many times on the voyage across. He appeared to have been cast into a trance by the nimble mounting of riches, his eyes glittering and never leaving the speaker's wild countenance. As the speech ended Six Fingers shook his head to shake off the spell and turned to lower at the main. Now the tattered fellow was strutting toward me, doffing his worn cap and bowing low. As I acknowledged his salutation he courteously informed me:

"I am Francois Narbonne. These off-scourings say I am mad. Perhaps it is so. I was poisoned in rue Quincampoix. I sold my heritage, 100,000 livres, and bought an estate in this land of gold. I paid 30,000 livres a square league for land I never saw. Now I pay you my respects, as I take it you must be some overlord; or do you hold only socage tenure?"

I began to sense tragedy in the pale face and reckless speech. He was not mad, I decided, but close to it. I put him down as a young roisterer back in Paris, who had become fascinated by the ridiculous tales. He had invested his entire patrimony in the land he had never seen. The island, the view of the main, the nature of his fellow voyagers, had awakened him to the truth. The stock-jobber's patter was his fashion of showing self-derision, perhaps was his only safeguard against insanity. I concluded I liked him. I briefly stated my name and my reasons for being on the Mississippi.

He threw back his head and laughed, laughed until the tears ran down his thin face. At last he gasped:

"A runaway Englishman forced to live here! And a Frenchman, who gives all he hath for the same blessed privilege! I must go without food for a day and say 12 paters and as many aves at the shrine of the Virgin. No, no. Not all that. I've been without food for three days. I owe nothing more than candles to the altar. I'll turn heretic. I'll turn Indian. Eh, Monsieur Brampton, would you kindly convince me with a display of the latest steps of the war dance?"

"H—l! But he's an odd fish!" mumbled Six Fingers. "He was dull enough coming over with his moping and groaning until we was two days from the coast. Then he began his talk about gold till one's mouth would water. Ah, now he begins."

Narbonne, who was addressing nonsense to the circle, suddenly gave his attention to me and explained:

"I was thirsty and wandered to one of the lakes of rare wine, which bless this island, and so was not here when the boats set sail. I was so busy gathering diamonds formed from dewdrops that I lost sight of the precious jewels among us here. I missed one jewel in particular; nor do I see her now. She was dressed in black, most unholy of colors for one entering this land of enchantment. Did she go to the mainland, or is she wandering about the island?"

"In the second boat," I coldly informed him.

The effect of the question on Six Fingers was amazing. He became transformed into a demon of hate, his squat body seeming to dilate as he crouched and glared at Narbonne.

"D—n your lugs!" he cried. "So that is your game, eh? You're after her."

"What! The old six-toed rat dares address the Mississippian without uncovering? I must have one of those withered ears." And out came the cut-and-thrust sword and Narbonne was lunging playfully and dexterously at the ancient. With a scream of rage Six Fingers leaped backward and yanked out his dirk, and catching it by the tip hurled it at his tormentor. Only by dropping to the ground did Narbonne escape it.

As I Spoke I Dropped on My Knees in the Sand and Drew My Knife.

Before the matter could proceed to more serious results Sergeant Suarez was between the two men, and hoarsely bawling:

"His excellency rules that blood will have blood. Hanging for a killing. The galleys for the man who attempts to kill. You two are so full of life you shall come with me and help bury two dead men and a woman. The rest of you stay here. And as for you, Englishman, his excellency's orders are that you be here when he returns."

"I came purposely to meet him," I said. "Till we meet again, Monsieur Narbonne."

"Monsieur is very polite. I repeat his words and look ahead to meeting him on the golden, silver mainland. Pardi! A grave-digger! Ho! Ho! Come along, little six-toed rat, we may find gold."

CHAPTER III

Bad News and Sad News.

Two years before, Nicholas de Fer, under directions from the company, had prepared a map of the Mississippi country which flamed the fever for speculation. The company also made changes in the old map made by John Senex, the Englishman, so as to picture the country a wonderful El Dorado, while Herman Moll, prominent English cartographer, marked across his map of the country west of the Mississippi:

"This country is full of mines."

It is true that my own countrymen, in petitioning the Lords of Trade to establish military posts on the Bahamas and Port Royal island to offset the evils of France's activity in colonizing the valley, urged that the cost of these posts could be met by gold mined in the Appalachians—"if only explorations are made to discover such." But unlike the French, my people never deliberately fooled themselves. That the company would resort to almost any deception to lure colonists to Louisiana was shown when silver was carried from Mexico to the upper waters of the Mississippi and later "discovered" there as proof of the rich mines waiting to be uncovered.

Bienville appeared at last, and once more he kept me waiting until he had loaded the two packets; only this time he did not leave with them. I saw Narbonne and Six Fingers return from burying the dead and clamber aboard the second boat. Their grewsome task seemed to have made them excellent friends, for they laughed and talked in an uproarious fashion.

His excellency now approached me, his steady gaze never leaving my face. He abruptly began:

"Monsieur Brampton, your coming gives me a disagreeable duty to perform. I could sentence you to be hung. I have had 12 deserters hung, and a spy is worse."

"That depends on the point of view, your excellency," I replied, rising and facing him. "You would never consider one of your spies to be as deplorable a creature as one of your deserters. May I assume from your words that you do not intend to hang me?"

"It will be the galleys," he coldly answered. "I should prefer to send you and other malefactors to work in the silver mines in the West. But that cannot be until I've completed negotiations with the Spaniards."

"Soldiers from Santa Fe have already come to the Missouri," I informed him. "So there is a trail that might be safer than the gulf route."

"So!" he exclaimed, and I knew I had his interest.

Then he returned to my case and said:

"Monsieur Brampton, you know me. It must always be that an eye calls for an eye. Blood demands blood. Treachery calls for exacting punishment. I will be just; which means the price must be paid. Whether it's one of my soldiers, a poor savage, or a runaway English, the price must be paid."

"Your excellency, I was told on Pontchartrain that you were grieved at something I was supposed to have done. I was warned that you would deal with me severely if I fell into your hands. I asked where I could find you, and the answer was 'Ship island.' Behold, I am here. Suppose you tell me what I have done to merit your displeasure. I have waited long here to be told."

"No, no, monsieur! Your assurance shall not blind me," he sternly replied. "I have no time to play with words. You know without being told how you have betrayed me."

I indignantly returned:

"Prove it! Or find one man to swear it on the Cross, and you're welcome to put me in a coffin and saw me in two. Your excellency, the accusation is as false as—"

He shook his head and morosely insisted:

"You would have a hard time proving your innocence. You are English. For three years you have been up and down the river. I know it has been said that you dare not go back to Carolina or Virginia. How do we know that is true? The last time you were here 40 of my men deserted immediately after you went up the river."

"So have they deserted before I ever saw the river. So they will continue to desert as long as they are allowed to run loose with the savages and forget the lessons of discipline. They have deserted to Pensacola as well as to the English colonies. They are protected by the priests in Pensacola even now. I repeat, on my oath, that I never encouraged a single desertion. Duty has driven me here, your excellency, and it is to be true to myself rather than because of your deserters that I will now complete my errand."

As I spoke I dropped on my knees in the sand and drew my knife.

"Can you read this?"

And with the knife-point I carefully began a picture in the sand. He stared down at my work, his broad forehead developing creases.

"Yes, I can read that," he slowly murmured. "It is a Natchez declaration of war against me. But I do not believe it."

"H—l!" I cried, springing to my feet and thrusting the knife back in the sheath. "You not only will send me to the galleys, but you will insult me first!"

Brampton escapes from the clutches of Bienville. How does he do it?

Prodigy Died Early

Two hundred years ago, on June 27, 1725, died, if contemporary records are to be believed, a four-year-old child who surely holds the record for infant precocity, says the London Post. A few hours after Christian Heinecker (he was a little German) came into the world he spoke, and in ten months could converse on most subjects. By the time he was thirteen months old the Bible was an open book to him. At the end of two and a half years he could answer any question dealing with history and geography and then turned his attention to languages. He learned to speak Latin and French fluently, but his feeble constitution broke down under the strain, and little Christian's "crowded hour" was at an end.

A Child's Laxative Which Mothers Can Rely On

To Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, it seemed cruel that so many constipated infants and children had to be kept "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

While he knew that constipation was the cause of nearly all children's little ills, he constantly advised mothers to give only a harmless laxative which would help to establish natural bowel "regularity."

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin mothers have a regulating laxative which they can depend upon whenever a child is constipated, bilious, feverish or sick from a cold, indigestion or sour stomach. All children love its pleasant taste.

Buy a large 60-cent bottle at any store that sells medicine and just see for yourself how perfectly it cleanses and regulates the bowels of infants and children.

...picions About Wall Street and How They Arise

By FRANCIS H. SISSON, President
Trust Company Division, American Bankers Association

WOULD-BE economists, political orators and the general public make frequent positive assertions about the functions of Wall Street without any realization of what constitutes Wall Street or what purpose it serves. Lack of knowledge breeds suspicion. Yet it is not difficult to understand the nature and function of Wall Street. Let us set down a few of the facts which account for the existence and nation-wide, as well as international, services of Wall Street.

F. H. Sisson

There are 316 banks in New York with combined capital and surplus of about $1,400,000,000. Their deposits aggregate over $11,500,000,000, and during 1924 their total volume of business reached nearly $250,000,000,000. The New York Stock Exchange in 1925 sold 463,000,000 shares of stock and in 1924 $3,828,000,000 worth of b nds. Wall Street is the national credit and money market. It is just as essential that there be markets for money and for ...ocks, bonds, mortgages and other securities as for cotton, corn, tobacco, wheat, hogs and other commodities.

If Wall Street Were Destroyed

Wall Street is the natural evolution of the forces of trade and finance. It xists because there is imperative need for it in the nation's business. If some cataclysm should destroy the nancial district of New York we would see frantic efforts to re-establish it so that trade and industry could continue. If the production and marketing of agricultural and industrial commodities did not need such a financial institution, Wall Street would not exist.

We depend upon the farmer to help maintain the general level of prosperity Wall Street as a money market is called upon to finance the growth and marketing of farm crops Many Wall Street bankers were born and raised on farms. If they were not thoroughly familiar with agricultural requirements, they could not hold their present positions in the financial world.

In the period of deflation, Wall Street suffered proportionately as much as the farmer. The aggregate losses of Wall Street banks mounted to a staggering sum. Wall Street is not an independent institution, but an organic part of the country's business system, necessarily reflecting the ups and downs of business.

Four Billion Dollars

An approximate estimate of the main items in Wall Street's financial operations in handling farm crops shows that New York banks for the purpose of agriculture put out commercial loans to the value of one billion dollars, hold bankers' acceptances for another billion, buy commercial paper such as cattle and sheep loans for a third billion and carry balances of country banks for a fourth billion Thus Wall Street furnishes a $4,000,000,000 river of credit annually to produce farm products and float them to market

The outward flow to rural banks enables them to make the required advances on farm crops and for warehousing and handling cotton, tobacco, wheat, raisins, prunes and countless other products Outside of his own personal efforts on his farm, Wall Street is the biggest single factor in the prosperity of the farmer After these commodities have been moved to market, the money used in handling them returns to Wall Street for investment. New York is the largest security market in the country and offers a use and market for the idle capital of the rural banks between crops

Funds from every part of the country flow to New York, attracted by the greater opportunity for their profitable use found in this center. Thus the accumulations of deposits are large, and in turn the openings for the full employment of these funds in the facilitation of trade, industry and investment are upon a correspondingly ample scale. It is clear that these funds must be employed sanely, constructively and to the real service of the business community. Otherwise they would inevitably soon be withdrawn.

Huge Investments Help Farmers

These huge investment operations in Wall Street are of significance to the farmer. Much of the $10,000,000,000 invested in farm mortgages was advanced by Eastern financial institutions. In no sense is Wall Street's interest in agriculture local or sectional. The main function of New York financial institutions is to send money where it is most needed.

Another service rendered to agriculture by Wall Street is the purchase of Farm Loan bonds, Joint Stock Land Bank bonds and the debentures of the Intermediate Credit Banks. There is a total of $1,451,800,000 of this paper outstanding, of which New York banks took about one billion.

Wall Street loans to country banks are made at low rates, usually below 4½ per cent. The local banker's rates to his customers are adjusted to local conditions, which cannot justly be laid at the door of Wall Street.

General financial service to other industries related to agriculture also helps the farmer substantially. Wall Street loans to the packers, railroads, millers and farm-machinery manufacturers to help them serve agriculture.

Wall Street is as necessary and serviceable in the handling of credit and capital as is the cold-storage plant in caring for seasonal perishable products. The necessity of such a credit center in a country with a $60,000,000,000 annual business is obvious.

What the People Want

Every great international bank in New York maintains close relations with thousands of other banks in the United States and in every foreign country of any importance. The movements of commerce and investment are supported upon this interrelated system of domestic and foreign banks. Thus it comes about that the products of the farm, factory and mine are financed by these banks all the way from the producer to the foreign consumer.

Wall Street in the discharge of its true functions as the nation's reservoir of capital and credit includes the whole business community in its field of operations. Its control lies with the people. Their demands govern it, and their presence or absence from the market determines its trends. Wall Street prospers as farming and industry prosper. Its service is to the people of the whole country and, for them, to the people of other countries. It is the direct reflection of American agriculture, industry and commerce.—From the Country Gentleman.

Manure Shed With Carrier Is Favored

...reading Direct From Stables Is Best Plan.

It is generally conceded that spreading direct from the stable secures the best returns from manure. Manure ordinarily handled is said to lose at one half of its value In many ...tors however, every-day handling is impossible and in these cases proper handling can do much to conserve the fertility as well as to keep things shipshape about the barn. The greatest sources of loss in the handling of manure are failure to absorb liquids by bedding, the leaching of soluble plant food from the heap and the burning up of organic matter through heating These losses can be lessened by the free use of bedding to absorb stable liquids and the building of a compact manure heap which will lessen or prevent heating and leaching A suitable clay or concrete basin to retain such liquids as do leak through still further reduces the loss A roof is not necessary unless it is desired to protect the carrier track.

A cow produces about twelve tons of manure yearly. This will require approximately 500-600 cubic feet for storage As much of the manure will be dropped in pasture you will have to determine the size required by the length of time elapsing between cleaning the pit. If there is opportunity to get the track well up it will lessen the amount of floor area required and at the same time secure a more compact manure heap. If the floor is to be driven on it should be made of one part cement, two parts clean coarse sand and four parts crushed stone or screened gravel and laid about eight inches thick. Use easy grades and a rough surface to prevent slipping as the horses haul from the pit.

Hog Influenza Is a New Ailment Among the Pigs

New diseases are constantly appearing among our animals, and the end is not yet. Hog "flu" may have existed for a long time, but was not recognized as a distinct entity in disease until quite recently. It spread among young swine at the stock show two years ago and during this interim has been reported throughout the United States

Its present name is derived from the fact that it greatly resembles influenza as seen in people and horses. Young swine are most susceptible, and the mortality is not high. However, it is a disease that must be reckoned with in shipping animals for exhibition purposes, or for any other purpose. It may be recognised by high fever, cough, difficult breathing and congestion of the mucous membranes. Special treatment does not seem to be indicated; good care is the main thing. There is no biologic that will protect hogs against this disease, but the disease has not been serious enough to warrant anyone in refusing to exhibit because of hog "flu."—George H. Glover, Colorado Agricultural College.

Satisfactory Plan for Storing Late Cabbages

A good method of storing late cabbages is to pull them up, roots and all, and set them side by side, with the roots down, in a shallow trench several feet in length. As many rows may be set out side by side as are necessary to accommodate the cabbage to be stored. The roots should be covered with earth. Inclose the cabbage bed formed by the rows with a frame of rails, boards, or poles, or by driving a row of stakes into the ground. This inclosure should be about two feet in height. The frame should be banked with dirt, and the top, which may be made by laying poles across the inclosure, should be covered with straw, hay, or corn fodder. When it is desired to start using the cabbages, they should be removed as needed, from one end of the bed When the cabbages are taken out the roots should be left in place, as they will sprout and furnish the family with an abundance of greens in the spring

Winter Care for Bees

Preparing the bees for their long winter vacation is a part of the fall program of work. Each colony should have a sufficient supply of food in order to winter through and make a strong brood before the honey flow starts in the spring Put the colony in a packing case for protection from the cold before the ground freezes.

New Egg-Drying Process

Chemical advance has now developed a process, already in commercial use, whereby large numbers of eggs can be kept for indefinite periods without the use of cold storage or preservatives, and which, it is said, will have a material effect upon the seasonal egg markets of the country. The new process produces perfectly dried eggs in the form of a powder. They will keep indefinitely and can be used for almost any form of cooking.

Autointoxication

At a dinner party an elderly lady of very prim and severe aspect was seated next to a young couple who were discussing the merits of their motor cars.

"What color is your body?" the young man asked the girl.

"Oh, mine is pink. What color is yours?"

"Mine," replied the young man, "is brown with wide yellow stripes."

This was too much for the lady. Rising from the table, she exclaimed to her hostess:

"I really must be excused. When you people ask each other such personal questions at a dinner party it is time I left the room."

At a district conference of restaurant keepers from seven mid-western states, held at Des Moines recently, a resolution for the use of corn sugar by restaurant operators was adopted. C. D. Stoddard of Cedar Rapids proosed the resolution and es-imated that the restaurants represented at the convention used annually in excess of 150,000,000 lbs. of sugar.

H. A. Bittenbender, at the head of poultry department at Iowa State college says that Iowa ranks first in the nation in both poultry quantity and value with 31,000,000 pens having a value of nearly $83,000,000 but the average egg production per bird is less than sixty-five eggs per year. Prof. Bittenbender insists that with care in feeding and exercise and protection from inclement weather the egg record could be materially increased.

The boom given corn products, especially sugar, has prompted the establishment of three new factories in Iowa in recent months. Penick & Ford, of Cedar Rapids, have the pioneer plant but another firm has gone into the business in that city and there is now a corn products factory at Clinton and one at Keokuk, making four in the state and these consume about 22,000,000 bushels of corn annually. That does not make a very big hole in the total of 478,000,000 bushels grown in the state last year, but factories in other states are turnin gout largo quantities of sugar and all of these working together are rendering the corn growers of the nation a distinct service.

Many know the story of Sinbad's Island. How one day the ship bearing him and his crew came close to what appeared to be an island. Permission was given to land and a fire had been started in the preparation of a meal, when the entire island began to tremble. The sailors rushed back on board ship, and found that what they had considered an island was nothing more than the back of a sleeping whale.

PLANS PROTECTION OF BENEFICIARIES

William Raduszis of Cleveland, Ohio, has been sentenced to serve from three to ten years in the penitentiary for embezzling from his brother, John, an insane World war veteran, $11,372.42 paid as disability compensation by the government.

Investigation was started last spring by the Cuyahoga county council of the American Legion. The embezzlement was discovered by Louis Laeger, rehabilitation officer at the government hospital at Chillicothe, Ohio, where John Raduszis is confined.

Mr. Laeger made inquiries as to why no money was received at the hospital to pay for incidentals for the insane man. Then investigation was started by the Legion organization, which led to the arrest and conviction of William Raduszis, who had been named as the brother's guardian. About $3,000 was recovered and will be conserved in the estate of the veteran.

Such conditions in the affairs of guardians of mentally incompetent veterans and minor orphans and others who are beneficiaries of the United States veterans' bureau are being constantly uncovered by the Legion and the national guardianship service of the veterans' bureau, which have been co-operating in a strict investigation of the guardianships.

Shell-shocked veterans are confined without care in many instances, the investigation is revealing. War orphans are neglected and hungry, while their guardians have been buying furs and automobiles with funds paid for the benefit of these wards of the government.

Plans are being considered by the Legion for setting up a state judge advocates system which will provide in every county an attorney who will guard the interests of bureau beneficiaries. Such a system is already in very successful operation in Illinois.

"A very large percentage of those who were originally appointed as guardians of bureau beneficiaries were not qualified for the trust," Maj. David G. Arnold, national guardianship officer of the veterans' bureau, says. "When called on recently to account for the administration of their trusts, they were unable to do so. Insufficient bonds, in some cases none at all, were given. Sureties were often of no responsibility. In many cases, as a result, the beneficiary has lost all the money that was paid by the government to the guardian for his account."

Forty-Acre Tract Used for Legion Playground

"Inspiration Home in God's Country." That is what they are calling the first completed unit of the first national playground of the American Legion. The camp is in the Legion's 40-acre tract in the San Isabel forest near Pueblo, Colo. It was recently dedicated.

The government set aside on request the 40-acre plot in the forest for the exclusive use of the Legion. The camp was established and is being operated by posts of the Legion at Westcliffe, Pueblo, Alamosa, Walsenburg, Florence, Canon City, Trinidad and Center.

Libraries for Hospitals

Installation of a complete library service in every hospital under the control of the United States Veterans' bureau is contemplated by Director Frank T. Hines, according to information received by the national rehabilitation committee of the American Legion. Legion officials were largely instrumental in this step in the interest of the disabled.

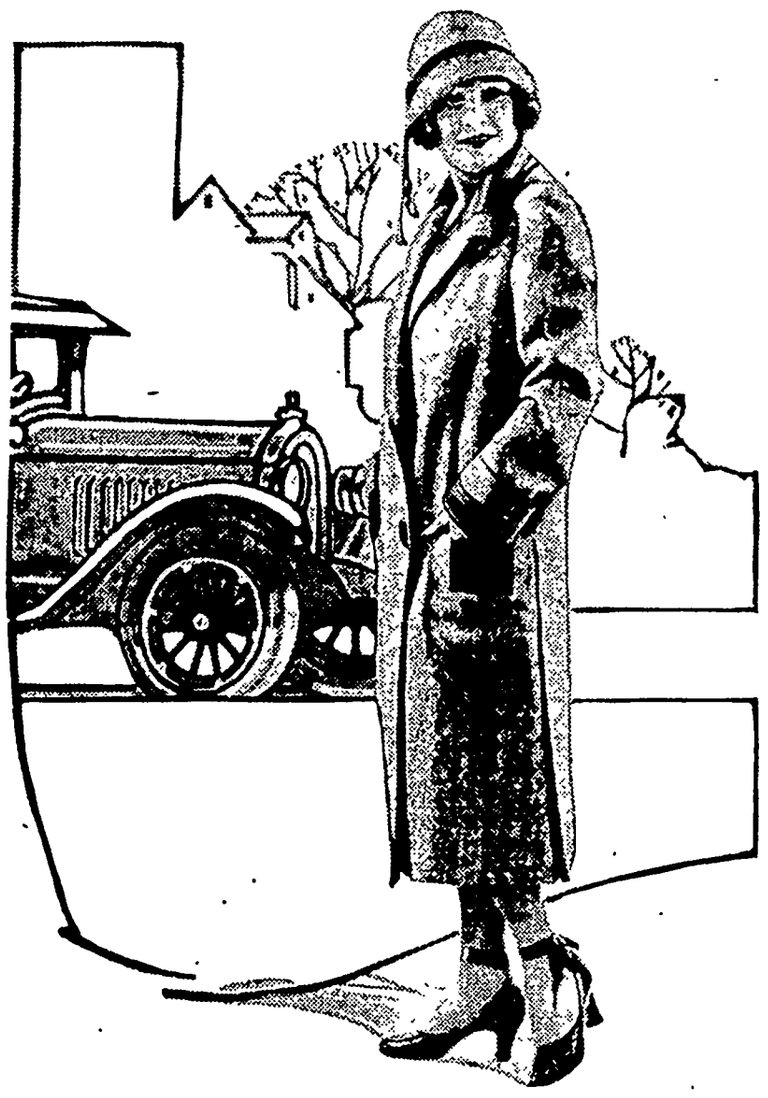
TWEED TOPCOATS FOR SPRING; TOTS' DRESSES CIRCULAR CUT

WHO would be without a handsome topcoat in midseason or springtime? A stylish coat under which one's every sort of a frock may be worn, spells economy, comfort, utility and smart appearance all in one breath.

With the popularity of colorful tweeds comes a new interest for coats developed of this fabric. Prominence is given to both straightline models and cape coats while the majority are fur-collared.

In the smart tweed coats attention is focused on color, for it is color which sheds a glow over all spring fashions. All the dusky pastel shades are given prominence but the rose tones especially bois de rose and Antoinette rose, are outstanding. Even the tans take on a rosy hue, and as for gray, every message from Paris strengthens one's enthusiasm for it not only for coats but for entire costume ensembles to the minutest detail and accessory. Soft shades of green are very highly regarded and it is said that for spring gobelin blue will take the place of gracklehead, which as every one knows was so popular during the winter months.



A Modish Tweed Coat.

Many of the tweed coats are made up with touches of solid-colored flannel blending or contrasting the characteristic shade in the tweed. This border treatment with a fur collar and handsome crepe lining bespeaks a spring wrap of distinguished and correct style.

The modish tweed coat in the picture carries all the points of proper mode. As to the length of the topcoat, to be sure there are those of extreme trend of mind who will insist on a wrap which is conspicuously short, but the average woman prefers a garment eleven or twelve inches from the floor.

A charming accessory to the spring tweed coat is the vivid scarf and this season these gay neckpieces will be an outstanding feature in street attire.

Among novelty coats for spring there is evidence of plaid being very popular, and especially black and white shepherd plaid. These plaided models are frequently styled with capelets.

Latest news from Paris foretells the popularity of buttons for trimming. For instance, detachable capes are buttoned to the sleeves down their entire length.

Just to give home dressmakers, who are in the midst of spring sewing, a hint of the new circular-cut treatment for little frocks this wee tot had her "picture taken." Is it not cunning, this diminutive frock which this tiny girl is wearing, which while it sacrifices none of its childish charm, yet somehow manages to acquire the new smart circular flare? Observe, too, if you please, that the sleeves extend from the neckline and that is another very stylish feature.

Of course a touch of embroidery adds another note of charm. The handmade yarn tassels and cord at the neck are also a pretty detail. The knickers, which are a part of every tiny child's dress nowadays, are strictly tailored, which fact the more accents the decorative details of the frock.

Most commendable materials for a dress made after the fashion of the one shown here are flannel, wool jersey, fine cotton poplin or gabardine. These fabrics come in all the new and delectable colorings such as navy, sand, gray, rose, peach, nile, gobelin and lavender-blue, flame color and the new wild honey shade. Another fabric which is making a pleasing impression is rayon-alpaca. Then there is linene and real linen, cotton broadcloth and sateen, the latter in colors and in black to be added to the list of solid-colored fabrics which make up into tailored smock effects with real satisfaction.

A further emphasis is placed on circular effects, in wee little skirts which ripple full about the hemline. Very new for even small children are these circular skirts made of solid-colored rayon-alpaca, with a plaided or striped overblouse which also is rayon-alpaca.

After making several of these tailored smocklike frocks as shown in the picture do not neglect to add a smocked peasant frock or two of fine voile done in colorful threads.

The vogue for using several pastel colors together is carried out in the designing of children's dresses. Patches of one-colored voile or linen are appliqued on another toned background.

A Little Bit Humorous

A LITTLE DIFFERENT

Hub—What was that letter you just tore up?

Wifey—Only from one of my relatives, trying to borrow money.

Hub—Your people are always trying to sting us for something. I'm glad you aren't going to answer it.

Wifey—Wouldn't think of it. This one happens to be from a brother-in-law.

Veracity

Foreman—How'd you come to leave your last place?

Applicant—I was discharged.

Foreman—Discharged, huh? What for?

Applicant—Doing well.

Foreman—Where was you?

Applicant—In a hospital.—American Legion Weekly.

AT THE SHOW

She—They say I have eyes like pop.

He—Ha! Pop-eyed.

Expensive Lessons

"I'm getting up a little poker game, major," invited the friend. "Would you like to join us?"

"Sir, I do not play poker."

"I'm sorry. I was under the impression that you did."

"I was once under that impression myself, sir."

Like "God Head"

He—Do you think that modern idealism is tending toward an epistomological monism?

She (misunderstanding him)—Not if you consider the inevitable sublimation of the ego as instinctive.—California Pelican.

He Was a Golf Ball

"What was Reggie at the masquerade?"

"He must have been a golf ball, for he was certainly 'teed' up."—Vanderbilt Masquerader.

Cause for Split

Koot—Why did Sally an' Hal break their engagement?

Cute—He saw her drop a biscuit she made on the floor an' her dog ate it an' died.

An Awful Flatterer

Grace—There goes Tom Alsmiles. He's an awful flatterer.

Mabel—Why? Did he tell you you were pretty?

Grace—No; he said you were.

EVEN SETTLES DEBTS

"Has George decided on your present yet?"

"Yep—and my future."

Not So Good

Doctor—I understand. You have a keen pain in your left shoulder.

Flapper—If you had it you wouldn't think it was so keen.

Points of View

The Philistine and the poet together viewed the advent of dawn.

"Ah," cried the Philistine, "it is the beginning of day."

"Alas!" he poet sighed, "it is the end of night."

Life

"Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Smith feel so sorry for each other."

"Why?"

"One has a baby and the other has not."

The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear;
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,

A FEW FAVORITES

Here are a few recipes that other folks like, and they may appeal to you.

Bon-Ton Omelet.—Beat the yolks and whites of four eggs separately. Mix one-fourth of a teaspoonful of cornstarch with one-half cupful of milk, then add to the yolks and fold in the beaten whites, add salt and pepper to taste and pour into a hot, smooth frying pan in which a tablespoonful of butter has been melted, and cook slowly, loosening the edges with a knife occasionally until done. Slash the opposite side and fold over on to a hot platter. Serve at once. If the top of the omelet does not seem to be well cooked, set in a hot oven for a few minutes before folding.

Quick Tea Cakes.—Cream two tablespoonfuls of butter with one cupful of sugar, add two-thirds of a cupful of sour cream, one-fourth teaspoonful of soda, two beaten eggs, one teaspoonful of vanilla, and one and one-half cupfuls of flour sifted with one teaspoonful of baking powder. Beat well; add a few raisins or one on top of each; bake in gem pans or irons and serve warm.

Prune and Date Jam.—Cook one pound of prunes until soft in a small amount of water. Remove the stones and add one pound of stoned chopped dates which have been cooked in a small amount of water. Add the juice of half a lemon with half a cupful of honey. Cook the mixture until thick.

Prune Cake.—Mix together and boil five minutes, the following: Two cupfuls each of brown sugar and boiling water, three cupfuls of soaked pitted prunes, stoned and chopped, one teaspoonful each of salt and cinnamon, one-half teaspoonful each of cloves and nutmeg. Dissolve a teaspoonful of soda in two tablespoonfuls of warm water, and add four tablespoonfuls of fat. Sift two cupfuls of flour with two teaspoonfuls of baking powder and add the first mixture with a cupful of chopped nut meats. Bake in a tube cake pan for one hour.

Oyster Soup Supreme.—Take one quart of veal or chicken stock, two tablespoonfuls of flour, two of butter, two-thirds of a cupful of minced chicken, one pint of oysters, one teaspoonful of onion juice, one cupful of thin cream, salt and pepper to season, and a little minced parsley. Prepare as usual, adding the oysters and chicken just long enough to curl the oysters, and heat the chicken. Sprinkle each bowl or cup with finely minced parsley and serve.

Good Things to Eat.

For a change from the every-day muffin here is a good one to try:

Rice Muffins.—To two well-beaten eggs add one cupful of milk, one teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of sugar, three cupfuls of flour sifted with three teaspoonfuls of baking powder; add one cupful of boiled rice and five tablespoonfuls of melted butter. Stir lightly and bake in muffin pans.

Asparagus Cream Salad.—Dissolve two tablespoonfuls of gelatin in one-half cupful of cold water, add one cupful of boiling water and cool. Rub one can of asparagus through a very coarse sieve, or cut it into small pieces. When the gelatin has dissolved and cooled add the asparagus, one cupful of pecans, one cupful of grated cheese and a few dashes of cayenne. Whip one cupful of heavy cream until thick and fold into the mixture. Let it harden in molds. Serve on lettuce with mayonnaise.

Stuffed Egg Salad.—Cut six hard-cooked eggs into halves lengthwise and remove the yolks. Cream four tablespoonfuls of butter and mix with the egg yolks; add six skinned and boned sardines to the egg yolks and stuff the whites with the mixture. Serve on head lettuce with a mayonnaise dressing.

Pimento Butter Sandwiches.—Cut white bread into one-fourth inch slices. Spread generously with pimento butter; spread lettuce leaves with mayonnaise and place between each pair of slices. Press edges lightly and cut into triangles. To prepare the pimento butter, cream one-half cupful of butter. Drain the liquor from a can of pimentoes, rinse with cold water and dry. Rub the peppers through a sieve and gradually work the pulp into the butter; season with salt. If the pimentoes are small, use four.

Popular Salad.—Soak one tablespoonful of gelatin in one-fourth cupful of cold water, then add one and one-half cupfuls of boiling water and stir until the gelatin is dissolved. Add one-fourth cupful of lemon juice, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, the grated rind of a lemon, then two cupfuls of chopped cabbage, one pimento chopped fine, two cupfuls of sliced, diced pineapple and one cupful of nut meats. Mold and serve on lettuce leaves with mayonnaise dressing.

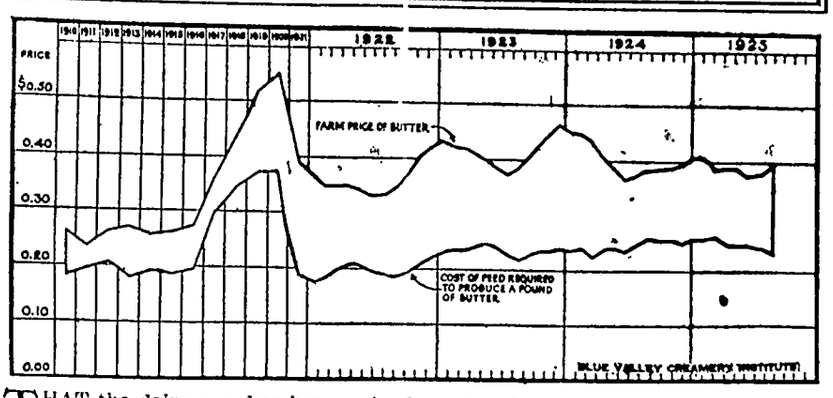
Dairy Cow Good Feed Market, Survey of Costs Discloses



THAT the dairy cow has been a good market for farm feed in the past year is shown in a survey just completed by the Blue Valley Creamery Institute. The cost of feeding a dairy cow for the 12 months ending August, 1925, averaged only 25.5 per cent more than in the prewar period from 1910 to 1914. This conclusion is based on farm prices of hay, grain and purchased feeds commonly used for dairy cows, as reported by the United States Department of Agriculture. It was assumed that 18 pounds of hay, 3 pounds of corn, 2 pounds of oats and 1 pound each of bran and cottonseed meal represented a typical balance of roughage and various concentrates in making up the dairy cow's daily menu.

Prices of dairy products have risen farther above the prewar level than is true of feed costs. The price of butter at the farm in the last 12 months was 56 per cent higher than the 1010 to 1914 average. The price paid to producers of fluid milk in the last 12 months was 48 per cent above prewar figures. Allowing equal value to butter and milk, the combined advance in dairy products is 52 per cent. No other farm animal earns as much as a dairy cow in converting feed into cash.

QUITE A NUMBER OF CHANGES ON FARMS THIS YEAR

Not Much Moving About In Town On The Annual Moving Day

Here we go again on the merry-go-round moving list of changes in this locality on March 1st. Every year at this time farmers and town people are busy getting settled in their new locations.

We try to get a fairly accurate list of moves made, but of course it is almost impossible to get them all and we have perhaps missed a few

Here they are:

We wil start with Albert Fuller as he is fat and good natured and has moved to Minnysotie to join the Swedes and luetfisk boosters. Albert has been living on the farm a few miles southeast of Klemme, recently purchased by Elko Buss. The farm will be occupied by Elko's son, Harry and family. Albert Fuller's address is now Good Thunder, Minn

Harry Buss has been living on the farm known as the Roscoe Wiles place and which was purchased by Nels Back. Nels and family have moved on the place now.

Carl Swanson is starting out as a farmer and he and his bride will live on the farm vacated by Nels Back.

Fred Krauss has moved to Elkton, Minn., where fishing is better than in Iowa, and Ed. Buentenbach and family moved on that farm. Ed. has been living on John Sanderfelt's farm and Carl Sanderfelt will till the soil there this year.

Hamo Beek and family have also deserted good old Iowa to sek their fortunes in Minnesota. They have moved to a fine farm east of Austin. Chris Anderson moves to the farm vacated by Beek. The place is also known as the Cherry Estate. Then Walter Reed moves to the farm vacated by Chris Anderson and family, on Bloom's Red Cloud Ranch, as it is called. Walter Anderson and wife move to the Steve Kleinmeier farm vacated by the Reed family.

Thatw as quite a round, but we guess we got it straight alright.

Fred Knoke, who recently had a sale, and who has been living on the Walter Ross place northwest of this town, movest to Clayton. One of the Lemke boys (we don't know just which one) moves to the farm vacated by Knoke.

Geo. Grosz had a sale and is quiting the farming business and has hied himself to Meservey. The farm where he was southeast of this place will be occupied by Mat Smith and Mr. Nelson moves to Mat's old place. These places are some distance from Klemme.

Lippo Wessels and family, who have been on the Mayme Costello place arem oving to a farm 6 miles east of Garner where Bob Garfield used to live. A Mr. Lyman is moving on the Costello farm.

Charlie Mickish has moved, from northwest of Klemme to a farm near Forest City. Clyde Marshal moves to the farm vacated by Mickish.

Earl Kahler and family, hwo have been living near Dexter, Minn. for several years, haye moved to the farm northwest of Klemme which has been occupied by Tim Waddingham. Tim purchased a farm northeast of Klemme and has moved on it.

Godfrey Geilenfeld, of near Garner, has moved to a farm south of Klemme.

Mr. and Mrs. Tom Roths haye moved to the Ed. Roths place south of Klemme, which Tom recently purchased. Henry Linne and family moved into the house vacated by Mr. and Mrs. Roths.

Some Moving About In Town

Kelley Louden moved last week to the former R. M. Thomas place in south-east Klemme, recently occupied by Wm. Madsen and family. Madsen's moved to Clear Lake some time ago.

Arthur Kudje and family have movedin to the place vacated Louden, as Mr. Kudje recently purchased the property.

Harold Leitzinger and family have moved into the Albert Yahnke residence vacated by Kudje's. Harold and family have been living with Henry Wille and family for a few weeks, since the hotel fire.

Mr. H. F. Yost and family, of Lidderdale, Iowa, have moved into the Fred Musfelt home. Mr. Yost is the manager at the North Iowa Grain Co. elevator and he and his family are now getting settled. We welcome the Yost family to our little city.

Mr. and Mrs Fred Musfelt are moving to Clear Lake.

The AMERICAN LEGION

(Copy for This Department Supplied by the American Legion News Service.)

SAMUEL TO ASSIST ADJUTANT BARTON

Frank E. Samuel of Topeka and Wichita, Kan., known nationally for his work as director of the organization and membership activities of the American Legion, was recently elevated to one of the most responsible positions in the Legion.

Under the recent consolidation plan affecting divisions of national headquarters, Mr. Samuel was named assistant to National Adjutant James F. Barton and also director of general administration, while retaining direction of national organization and membership matters. The duties of national adjutant will be handled by Mr. Samuel in the absence or incapacity of Mr Barton.

Mr. Samuel has one of the biggest jobs in the Legion on his hands, but his preparation for it has been long and thorough.

He began his Legion work with the inception of the organization in 1919. His first experience in Legion administration was gained as assistant department adjutant of Kansas during July and August, 1919. After sixty days as assistant adjutant, so efficient was his work, the department heads saw fit to appoint him as department adjutant. Under his regime as adjutant from September, 1919, to February, 1924, Kansas department became one of the strongest in the Legion.

When national headquarters learned of the good work Mr. Samuel was doing out in Kansas, he was drafted to head the organization and membership division for the national organization. He began that work on February 15, 1924.

Mr. Samuel served overseas during the World conflict as an enlisted man with the Three Hundred and Fifty-Third (Kansas) Infantry He was assigned to special duty with the regimental intelligence and operations section. He attended the officers' training school of infantry at Langres, France. "But," explains Mr. Samuel, "the armistice came along before the commissions were handed out, and another good 'buck' private was saved for competent kitchen police duty."

Mr. Samuel was born at Downing, Mo., December 31, 1889. He was educated at Washburn and Fairmont colleges and holds an A. B. degree from the latter. He taught English from 1912 to 1916 in Canton Christian college, Canton, China.

Philadelphia to Have Americanism Congress

Philadelphia will be the scene of a great national congress of Americanism next fall, if plans authorized by the national executive committee of the American Legion are carried out.

It was suggested that a congress of all organizations interested in Americanism activities would be an especially fitting observance of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration of Independence in Philadelphia on July 4, 1776.

Holding of the congress immediately before or during the national convention of the American Legion, which meets in Philadelphia, October 11 to 15, is the plan.

National officers of the Legion, the national Americanism commission and officials of Pennsylvania and Philadelphia will co-operate in developing the plans.

NEWS REVIEW OF CURRENT EVENTS

New Tax Bill, as Fixed by Conferees, Now Is Law—Wet and Dry Conflict.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

APPROVED by the house and senate and signed by President Coolidge, the "revenue act of 1926" as fixed up by the conference committees is now a law. The house accepted the conference report by a vote of 354 to 28. The negative votes represented the opposition of the radicals to reductions of high surtaxes and estate taxes and the protest of another group that wished the estate tax completely repealed.

Republicans recorded in the negative were Representatives Beck, Browne, Lampert, Nelson, Peavey, Schafer, Schneider and Voigt of Wisconsin, Ramsey (Iowa), Anthony and Hoch (Kan.), Johnson, Christopherson and Williamson (S. D.), Simmons (Neb.), and Sinclair (N. D.).

Democrats were Representatives Drane, Green and Sears (Fla.), Allgood and Oliver (Ala.), Howard and Morehead (Neb.), and Gilbert (Ky.).

Others voting in the negative were Representatives Carss, Kvale and Wefald (Farmer-Labor, Minn.), and La Guardia (Socialist, N. Y.).

Representative McDuffie (Dem., Ala.), was recorded as present.

Ten senators voted against the bill, with 61 recorded in favor of it. The negative votes were cast by Senators Frazier and Nye (Rep., N. D.), Norbeck (Rep., S. D.), La Follette (Rep., Wis), and Howell (Rep., Neb.), Walsh and Wheeler (Dem., Mont.), Blease (Dem., S. C.), and Trammell (Dem., Fla.), and Shipstead (Farmer-Labor, Minn.).

With the exception of Senator Trammell, who registered his protest against the continuance of the estate tax, the opposition was based chiefly upon reductions in high surtaxes and estate tax rates, repeal of publicity and other features which the more radical senators have attacked.

By the new law the government's income is reduced by about $387,000,000 in 1926 and $343,000,000 in 1927. Though the cut greatly exceeds that recommended by the treasury, Secretary Mellon is not worried for he believes that if business continues good the revenues will be sufficient. The President, too, is fairly well satisfied with the measure but counts on congress to be economical in appropriations for new expenditures.

An important feature of the new law is the creation of a permanent joint congressional committee of ten whose duty is to investigate the operation and effects of the present tax system, to investigate the administration of taxes by the bureau of internal revenue, to investigate measures and methods for the simplification of such taxes, to make a definite report to the senate and house embodying recommendations not later than December 31, 1927, and to report otherwise to the finance and ways and means committees and to the senate and house from time to time as investigations are made or recommendations decided upon.

THOUGH trained observers assert there is not the slightest chance for modification of the Volstead act at this session of congress, the wets are carrying on their campaign vigorously. Their "face the facts" conference in Washington was attended by more than 500 men and women from all parts of the country and was marked by Senator Edge's plea for a nation-wide referendum on proposals to legalize beer and light wines and to tighten the law against distilled spirits. In the house of representatives wet and dry members are advocating, respectively, examination of the books and activities of the Anti-Saloon league and the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment. William H. Stayton, executive head of the association, has announced that the organization is willing to have its books looked into if the league is ready to reveal its records, and if the World League Against Alcoholism, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the board of temperance, prohibition and public morals of the Methodist Episcopal church, the Committee of One Thousand of New York, and the Flying Squadron of Indianapolis are willing to follow suit.

The house alcoholic liquor traffic committee, having failed to receive from the rules committee a recommendation that it be given authority to inquire into prohibition, plans to make the investigation on its own account.

SENATOR WHEELER of Montana has introduced a resolution calling for an investigation of the alleged activities of the Hungarian minister to the United States to bring about the recent exclusion of the Countess Karolyi from the country by the State department. The resolution asserts that the charge has been made that the countess' exclusion resulted from the "forging of certain documents" which tended to connect her with undesirable political organizations with which the United States was not on friendly terms. It charges that the Hungarian minister to the United States paid a private detective agency $20,000 for inaccurate and false reports obtained through the "hounding" of the Count and Countess Karolyi while on a visit in this country prior to the trip on which she was excluded.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE lets it be known that he is opposed to the development of military aviation on the scale advocated by Col. William Mitchell and his followers because in his opinion it would entail what he regards as an enormous and unjustified expense and also would foster the same spirit of militarism in this country as moved Germany to embark in the World war. Furthermore, he thinks it would cause a renewal of the old game of armament competition between nations. The President urges the passage of the bills introduced which carry into effect the recommendations of the Morrow aircraft commission.

The White House spokesman says Mr. Coolidge is extremely gratified by the performances of this congress up to date. He does not hesitate to pronounce it a record breaker in prompt disposition of the tax bill, the world court resolution, appropriation bills and other bills, and is not surprised that the leaders now expect to clean up work and adjourn the session by June 1. He regards it entirely feasible to dispose of agricultural and railroad labor bills, Muscle Shoals, war debt settlements, remaining appropriation bills, and the aircraft program without prolonging the session beyond that date.

THERE is another fight on between the President and the recalcitrant group in the senate, involving several questions. These are the ratification of the Italian war debt settlement, approved by the house; the resolution aiming at prosecution of Secretary Mellon's Aluminum Company of America, supported by most of the Democrats and by the radical Republicans, confirmation of the appointment of Thomas F. Woodlock to be a member of the interstate commerce commission, opposed by those who call him a "Coolidge Democrat," a reactionary and a "Morgan man"; and confirmation of the appointment of Wallace McCamant of Oregon to a federal judgeship. It is predicted that the President will win in the two first mentioned matters and probably lose in the last two.

MEXICO has replied to our government's protest against its new land and oil laws, reaffirming its position that these laws are not retroactive and confiscatory. According to reliable information, Secretary of State Kellogg has virtually warned the Mexican government that American recognition of the government of President Calles will be withdrawn, Ambassador Sheffield called home, and diplomatic relations broken off if Mexico persists in giving a retroactive interpretation to the new laws. Such retroactive contruction would have the effect of confiscating, our State department contends, not less than half of the $1,000,000,000 of American investments in Mexico.

Great Britain also filed a protest against the laws not long ago, and it is likely that if Washington withdraws recognition of the Calles government, the British will follow suit. English investments in Mexico amount to about $800,000,000.

CHICAGO'S determined effort to rid the city of the Sicilian gun men is being aided by the federal immigration authorities and is bearing fruit. The police gathered in large numbers of the Italians and sorted out more than a score who could not show their right to be in the country and will be deported. Dozens of others have fled to other localities, where they are being rounded up. The imported Sicilians have been especially active in the murderous wars carried on by the rum runners, hi-jackers and illicit distillers and they are held responsible for numerous killings. The police raids were brought on by a recent disclosure in court that American-born citizens are afraid to serve on juries where Sicilians are being tried for crimes. The Chicago authorities and the supervisors of immigration declare they are prepared to go the limit and Washington will not be slow to issue the deportation warrants.

POPE PIUS XI has opened the way for negotiations between the Vatican and the Fascist government of Italy which may result in the settlement of the whole Roman question and bring about an accord between the Holy See and the Italian state. In a letter to Cardinal Gasparri the pope said he would not recognize the forthcoming church reform laws, soon to be passed by the Italian parliament, unless an official accord was reached with the Holy See. The pope added that no such accord can be reached while he is kept a "prisoner in the Vatican" by the "iniquitous conditions" imposed on the pontiff when the Italians occupied Rome in 1870 and destroyed the temporal powers of the pope.

DIPLOMATS of Europe are looking forward to a stormy session when the League of Nations council meets March 8 for the purpose of admitting Germany. Berlin has asked that Briand of France, Chamberlain of Great Britain and Stresemann of Germany hold a preliminary meeting March 7 to try to come to an understanding on the question of enlarging the council by taking in Poland, Spain and Brazil or any one of them. The Germans do not object to giving Spain a permanent seat in the council but will not stand for the admission of Poland. Chamberlain's role of peacemaker is difficult. He professes to believe the permanent council should be enlarged, but the British cabinet is said to be flatly opposed to such action at this time, holding that it would be a breach of faith to Germany and a betrayal of the Locarno pacts.

CROWN PRINCE CAROL of Rumania seems to have won his fight against Premier Bratiano and the latter's brother-in-law, Prince Babu Stribey, favorite of the queen, and his early return to Bucharest is expected. Bratiano's power is broken and he has tendered his resignation, while Prince Babu has been forced out of public affairs entirely. Carol arrived in Paris last week, accompanied by Magda Lupescu, and the official courtesies accorded him were significant. He probably will soon retract his renunciation of the throne, go home and become regent for his aged and sick father, King Ferdinand.

THOUGH one hesitates to help along the publicity campaign of the countess of Cathcart, it seems necessary to record that, having been allowed ten days of liberty in New York on her personal bond, she is now likely to be returned to Ellis Island and thereafter deported to England unless she wins in the habeas corpus proceedings started by her attorneys. The Department of Labor has refused a rehearing of the case, holding that it is now within the federal courts. The department would welcome a court interpretation of the "moral turpitude" provision of the immigration law. The defense is ready to show the offense of the countess is not a crime in South Africa, where she and the earl of Craven spent a year after their elopement.

Community Building

Municipal Parks One of Today's Great Needs

Municipal parks of the larger type, which combine the advantages of the great national parks and the small neighborhood parks, are, in some respects, the type most needed by American cities, Karl B. Lohmann, chief of landscape architecture at the college of agriculture, University of Illinois, says in an article in Parks and Recreation.

Our great national parks are too far removed from the people in cities to serve them adequately, Lohmann points out. Neither are the small neighboorhood parks, which are within easy reach of many, the ideal form because they afford so little of what the brain-wearied people of the city most demand, he adds.

"The type to which we may turn, therefore, must be one that combines as nearly as possible the advantages of these two extremes, having primarily scenery on the one hand and accessibility on the other. From this we may assume that it must be a place of considerable size, within fairly convenient reach of the people and offering them a feeling of the open country, with woods and views over stretches of grass and water sufficient to provide refreshment of mind and body for hours at a time."

Parks are beginning to occupy an outstanding place in the lives of the American people, Lohmann says. Millions of dollars have been spent in this country and millions of acres have been acquired for park purposes, while the demand for parks goes on increasing and finds continuous expression in the acquirement of new lands and further new developments.

Correct Rather Than Cover City's Faults

"Boost Spokane," says an advertisement of the Western city; "boom its merits, but forget its faults," or words to that effect.

When a city's boosters bid its citizens forget its faults, they forget that, even as a matter of mere expediency, honesty is the best policy. They ignore the truth that there are elements of progress which are bigger than mere bigness. If a city is to reach its best possible estate, it must be told its faults. It must welcome painful truth-telling. "Faithful are the wounds of a friend." Honest fault-finding is one of the greatest benefits that can be bestowed upon government. Exposure of a city's faults is the best boosting it can have.

One compounds evil who tries to conceal the fact of its existence. Delayed exposure of wrong reacts to the disadvantage of a city in all ways. It is told that in Denver organizations have insisted that nothing be published that would "hurt business." Facts as to concealment are sure to be more damaging than the publication of the truth at first would have been.—Chicago Journal.

Smaller and Better

"At the risk of incurring the scorn of the go-getters, I think that I shall withdraw my support from the bigger-and-better city movement and devote it to the smaller-and-better city movement," said Mr. Cato Ninetails. "There is nothing reactionary about this; quite on the contrary, it is progressive. The bigger-and-better movement, if not as old as the hills, is doubtless as old as cities. The smaller-and-better movement is a reform, a getting away from old things, a getting away from old 'slogans,' as they are so ineptly called. The bigger-and-better movement has been in progress for a long time, and it has achieved remarkable results in the way of bigness, but nothing at all in the way of betterment It may be that bigness and betterness are incompatible."—Indianapolis News.

Fire Alarm Lights

Because the use of red lights for motor-car stop signs, and other warnings, tends to detract from the effectiveness of the color when applied to locating fire alarm boxes and stations, Detroit's city council has recommended that purple be adopted for fire purposes. Boxes are to be illuminated by a special type of lamp with a purple lens on each side. Experiments are said to have shown that this shade is visible under unfavorable conditions, caused by smoke or fog. The words "fire alarm box" are to be placed on the posts in letters discernible at a distance of 300 feet. It is proposed to forbid the use of the color for other purposes.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Decorative Plants

Plants, bulbs, flowers or fruit form house decorations which give much return in pleasure for very little money spent. The important thing, however, is to be on the lookout for something that will give the touch to a room that corresponds to the high light in a picture.

English ivy, especially when trained over a trellis, is very satisfactory. Bulbs also give excellent results and for those who enjoy flowers but do not care to spend much time over them nothing is so desirable as paper white narcissus. Hyacinths, jonquils and pale pink Murillo tulips are lovely.

GOOD HEALTH NECESSARY

Many Busy Women Owe Their Health to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Fifty years ago there were few occupations for women. Some taught school, some did housework, some found work to do at home and a few took up nursing.

Today there are very few occupations not open to women. Today they work in factories with hundreds of other women and girls. There are also women architects, lawyers, dentists, executives, and legislators. But all too often a woman wins her economic independence at the cost of her health.

Mrs. Elizabeth Chamberlain who works in the Unionall factory making overalls writes that she got "wonderful results" from taking Lydia E Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Mrs. Chamberlain lives at 500 Monmouth St., Trenton, N. J. She recommends the Vegetable Compound to her friends in the factory and will gladly answer any letters she gets from women asking about it.

If Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has helped other women, why shouldn't it help you?

A Few Little Smiles

FINE WORDS

"Can a body eat with these things?" asked an elderly lady, looking at some dental plates.

"Madam," the dentist replied, "mastication can be performed with those with a facility scarcely excelled by that of the product of nature."

"Yes, yes, I know, but can a body eat with 'em?"—Tit-Bits.

The Cause of Delay

Miss Flirt—Hurry to the door, Mary, and let Mr. Smith in. He has rung twice.

Something Wrong

Consolation in Jail

"There's one consolation in being in jail."

"What is that?"

"There's nobody to wake you up in the middle of the night to tell you to go down and be sure the back door's locked."

Whatever It Was Worth

"And now," said the prospective father-in-law, "what about your income?"

The young man smiled engagingly.

"I thought I would leave that to you," he explained.

We want you to make this test

We want every weak, puny, fagged-out man and woman in America to make this test: buy one bottle of Tanlac at your druggist's, take it according to directions for one week and see how quickly you get started back to full strength and vigor.

We know what we are talking about. Tanlac has helped millions. In our files are more than 100,000 letters of praise from grateful users.

Don't confuse Tanlac with ordinary patent nostrums. It is Nature's own tonic and builder, compounded from roots, barks, and herbs that we gather at great expense from the four corners of the earth.

Tanlac goes straight to the seat of your trouble; cleanses and purifies the blood stream; puts your digestion in proper shape. First thing you know you have an appetite like a starved child. You rest at night and your whole body begins to feel the stir of strength and energy.

Don't you be discouraged. Don't put off testing Tanlac another day. Get a bottle now and in a week you should notice signs of real improvement. Then you will feel like your old self again. Take Tanlac Vegetable Pills for constipation.

Nurse Tells Surprising Results of Tanlac

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 83

"Purges" and "Physics" Bad for Old Folks

While Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, knew that constipation was the curse of advancing age, he did not believe that a "purge" or "physic" every little while was necessary.

To him, it seemed cruel that so many constipated old people had to be kept constantly "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin he discovered a laxative which helps to "regulate" the bowels of old folks. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin not only causes a gentle, easy bowel movement but each dose helps to strengthen the bowel muscles, shortly establishing natural "regularity." It never gripes, sickens, or upsets the system. Besides, it is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take.

If past fifty, buy a large 60-cent bottle at any store that sells medicine and just see for yourself.

The Warning One

On the plains of the West thousands of cattle may be seen grazing as one. They move slowly, feeding as they go, their heads pointing in the same direction. Occasionally among the hundreds there will be one individual that ignores the custom of the others and feeds where it will. The cattlemen have learned through experience to look to such an animal for the salvation of the rest in times of emergency. When wild creatures attack or sudden storms break, the solitary feeder is one to give warning or lead the herd to safety.—Cornelia James Cannon in the Atlantic Monthly.

Begging the Question

Begging the question is assuming a proposition which, in reality, involves the conclusion. Thus, to say that parallel lines will never meet because they are parallel, is simply to assume as a fact the very thing that you profess to prove. A "circle" in logic is a vicious form of argument in which the conclusion is assumed to prove the premise, and then the premise to prove the conclusion.

KANAWHA WON THE COUNTY B. B. CHAMPIONSHIP

Klemmo Lost Out In First Round In Game With Kanawha

One of the largest crowds that ever appeared at a basket ball game in the county took in the first round of games at Britt last Friday evening.

Klemme was there in full force and about half of the crowd at the games were Klemme boosters, filling the entire south half section of Britt's big gym. Nobody stayed in Klemme that night except those who were too feeble to attend the game.

Things started off lively and Britt walked all over Hayfield, Corwith cleaned house with Crystal Lake, and Kanawha trounced our basket-shooters to the tune of 32-18.

The outcome of these games put Kanawha against Garner with a sad ending for Garner. Britt cleaned Corwith next day too and that pitched Britt and Kanawha together for the final game Saturday night. Kanawha has the fastest team in the county and they simply made duck soup out of the big Britt boys, and now that pretty silver cup roosts on a shelf in the Kanawha schol.

Kanawha has a clean, snappy outfit and they made a fine appearance on the floor. Hancock county does not have big enough game for those lads and they can step out and trim some pretty big teams.

We look for Kanawha to get a long ways in the State tournament

Klemme shouldh ave given the Norwegians more of a battle, but somehow, our boys were not up to standard when they met Kanawha. Kanawha was just too fast company for them and our boys lacked their usual form and they seemed to play in hard luck. But we still claim they can lick any team in the county—outside of Kanawha, perhaps, and at that we would like to see them mix it with the Norwegians again.

KLEMME BOYS BASKET BALL TEAM LOST TO KANAWHA IN COUNTY TOURNY

Klemme Enters State Tournament At Mason City This Friday Night; Play Hansell

Our boys were not fast enough for the Kanawha Norwegians. Neither were any of the other teams at the county tournament at Britt fast enough for Kanawha defeated all others they played. Garner and Britt both yielded to their mighty prowess. Garnerl ost to them by a score of 22 to 10 while Britt was defeated by 33 to 22. Had our team displayed the same form they have at timos this season displayed the score would have been more close than it was.

The tournament was a decided success financially. Over $400.00 was taken in at the door. After expenses are paid the balance will be apportioned among the schols participating in the tournament. There were seven schools represented.

Klemme Plays At Mason City Friday Night

Our team will be at Mason City at 7:00 o'clock Friday evening of this week to contest with Hansel Consolidated School in Class B. Class B. schols include all high schols with an enrollment of less than 100 students. Schools with an enrollment more than 100 enter as Class A. Schools.

Contestants Have No Luck

Our contestants at Belmond fared no better than at Britt. Clarion won every one of the firsts and Kanawha all of the seconds. Belmond was not mentioned in the placoments announced.

"—OR I DIE"

SYNOPSIS.—Traveling by canoe on the Mississippi, on his way to Biloxi, in the early days of the settlement of Louisiana, William Brampton, English spy, known to Indians and settlers as the "White Indian," sees a Natchez Indian post a declaration of war against the French. For his own purposes, he hastens to Biloxi to carry the news to Bienville, French governor. Brampton meets an old friend, Joe Labrador, Indian halfbreed, who warns him Bienville has threatened to hang him as a spy. Brampton refuses to turn back. He falls in with Jules and Basile Mattor, on their way to Biloxi to secure wives from a ship, the Maire, bringing women from France. At Biloxi Brampton protects a woman from a sergeant's brutality. She tells him she is Claire Dahlsgaarde, picked up in a raid in Paris. Evidently well bred and educated, she is a mystery to Brampton. He intervenes to prevent a man, English, known as "Old Six Fingers," following her to New Orleans. A Frenchman, Francois Narbonne, slightly demented by stories he has heard of the riches of the New World, introduces himself. Bienville accuses Brampton of treachery.

"I can hold deceit to be excusable when you are fighting against the galleys," he answered. "I have not intended to insult you, simply to speak what is in my heart. Monsieur Brampton, you know the Indians of the valley. You must know that a declaration of war, posted within the limits of any French settlement, would never be left for you to bring to me. And I have heard the news from no one else. Enough of this. I trust the English as I would that lying Recollect priest Hennepin, who did so much mischief by his cursedly false description of this country."

There was nothing for me to say; and I stood and stared out over the gulf.

The governor continued in a cold, brittle voice—

"Pennsylvania has sent out scouts for three years on the Ohio and the Mississippi to learn what the French are doing."

"Yet Governor Spotswood, only this last spring, reported to the Lords of Trade that the French 'have a settlement at Habbamalas.' I was told this in Canada by a friendly Carolinian. It shows that Spotswood's scouts have been ten years in learning of the French occupation of Alabama. It would seem that the English scouts are a small danger."

He wrinkled his brows in perplexity. If I were what he charged, then I must be of but small value to the English for not having reported the Alabama settlement in 1717, when I first visited the lower river. As a matter of fact I had never dreamed that my countrymen were in ignorance of conditions which had existed ever since 1710.

After a brief silence he asked:

"You say the Spaniards have visited the Missouri by an overland trail from Santa Fe?"

"They joined the Paducahs near the Kansa river, intending to raid Fort Chartres. The entire invading force was killed by the Osage Indians."

"But you did not say this before, that they were killed, that they came to attack Chartres!" he cried, now betrayed into a bit of excitement.

"I considered the thing most important to you to be the fact that there is an overland trail to Santa Fe, practical for troops. I save unimportant, but interesting, details for friends There is no danger to Fort Chartres."

"We will go back in your boat," he muttered, leading the way to where the two Mattors were impatiently waiting for me. With them were two women. "How do I know the Natchez have declared war?"

The question satisfied me he was beginning to weaken, to doubt my guilt.

"Impose your cursed sentence and have done with it," I exploded. "But do not insult me further unless you are ready to give me satisfaction."

As I grew hot he grew cold and eyed me curiously.

"The governor of Louisiana can hardly fight with a felon. He will not fight with a friend," he quietly remarked. "If the Natchez have struck the Warrior's Post—and I will soon learn the truth—I shall suspend sentence on you until I can probe deeper into the desertions. Here, you, Jules Mattor! We go back at once. We have no room for women. They must go in the packets."

"But please, Monsieur your Excellency," pleaded old Jules, "these will be our wives."

"Not while you have Indian wives on Lake Borgne," growled the governor. "I will not have the Choctaws about my ears because their adopted brothers are playing fast and loose with their women. You two young women will return to your companions. Not a word, Mattor, I am in a bad mood. Up with that sail and set me across with all haste."

The voyage was uneventful until we drew near the Deer Island channel and sighted a small pirogue rounding the eastern end. Bienville rose to his feet, snatched up one of my robes and waved it back and forth until the two men in the pirogue observed the signal. A moment of hesitation, and then they shifted their course and paddled briskly toward us. They were thin, wiry, dark-complexioned fellows of the pronounced French voyageur type, and both were strangers to me.

"Ho, Jean Dumouy, what brings you here?" demanded Bienville.

"A speaking-bark from Monsieur le Page du Pratz of Bayou St. Jean, your excellency," replied the fellow holding to the side of our boat, and using the Indian term for the written message.

The governor read the communication with compressed lips; then asked:

"You have just arrived?"

"With all haste. Yes, your excellency. We were making for the fort when we saw the boats and turned back, thinking to find—"

"Enough! Go to the fort and get food and drink. I will have a message for you to take back."

As the pirogue dropped away Bienville reread the message with frowning brows. Du Pratz had spent much time among the Natchez. Knowing the message was from him I was not surprised when Bienville came aft and informed me:

"You heard the boatman. Monsieur du Pratz writes to inform me the Natchez have declared war for the Month of Peaches. Some of his men brought the news down the river. They must have been close on your heels."

I recalled my impression of the object in the river moving behind the mass of drift. As I remained silent Bienville stiffly added:

"I make my apologies for seeming to doubt your word."

"You owe me no apologies. I owed it to myself to tell you with all haste, seeing that I make free of the lower Mississippi where you rule. Perhaps my motive was a selfish one; perhaps I feared the Natchez in going to war might mistake me for a Frenchman and stick an ax in my head."

"We will have a talk later," he muttered, his powerful mind already forecasting the future and seeking ways and means to mollify or block the Natchez. "I do not say I shall lift the peace calumet to you; but just now I feel more tolerant."

Like the shares of the Mississippi company my stock was going up. I knew my promptness in bringing the Natchez news had proved to be the strongest kind of medicine for me. And in a like manner have I often escaped a dangerous climax by stumbling upon some situation which I could twist to my own use and benefit. I was entirely composed by the time we landed on the east shore of the bay near Fort Maurepas.

Bienville led the way to a grove of pines and threw himself on the needles and motioned me to take my ease. He began:

"Monsieur Brampton, I have decided that I believe you when you say you had nothing to do with the desertion of my soldiers. There would be no reflection on your personal honor if I were forced to believe to the contrary. Nor have I any proof that you are an English spy. Now, monsieur, you have lived much along the river. Tell me what you consider to be France's greatest help and her greatest hindrance in developing the Mississippi valley."

Promptly and truthfully I answered:

"You are her greatest help, your excellency. France's belief in myths and fairy-tales is her greatest hindrance."

"But your governors believe in mines among your mountains."

"That is not believing in myths and fairy stories. There may be mines there. Mines are often found in mountains. But we do not colonize for mines. Englishmen clear the forests, make homes, plant crops. They press forward slowly, making sure of the ground they spread over. When the first colonists came to Virginia there were many adventurers among them. Like the Spanish and French in Florida and Louisiana they wanted quick wealth. Some went mad in their hunt for pearls after finding them in common use among the Indians. Then came men and women who built cabins and planted crops. They spent no time hunting pearls."

With a sigh he said:

"True. The good God knows I have always urged that colonists be sent over who would work the soil and raise families. My brother Iberville prophesied that the English would control the whole continent within 100 years if we French did not take root up and down the valley. And you may have seen today what kind of colonists they send me! What are your plans?"

Our wandering talk, ending with the pointed question, satisfied me he had been laying an ambush for me. I yawned sleepily and said: "I have none. By and by back to Canada. Perhaps a trip into the West among the Indians of the plains."

"You dare not go back to the English colonies?"

I laughed grimly.

"Virginia or Carolina would give many pounds to get me there."

Which was true in a fashion, for my budget of news was easily worth a good price now that the English were awakening to the fact that the French were thick among the Alabamas.

Bienville rose and brushed the needles from his coat and said:

"You are English, monsieur. I have made my decision. The English have their spies up and down the river. I, too, have spies on the coast. One of them should be showing up any time now—if he has not been killed. He will bring your complete history. You are what you claim to be, or an enemy of France. I must know the truth."

"I thank your excellency. I only hope your man is painstaking and honest."

"He is what he is, but he will bring an honest talk to me. He is very wise. You must stay here until he returns."

"I am under arrest?"

"No, no. Simply my guest until I can give you a clean bill. Damoan will be most careful to get the facts right."

There was a mist before my eyes that was not from the steaming water. There was a chill in my heart that even the Louisiana sun could not dispel. Yet force of habit permitted me to wear a mask of indifference, but it was a moment before I dared trust my voice. Then I said:

"I am glad Damoan is the man to look me up. He will make no mistake. He will not hold back for fear of discovery, and then come here and report lies to you."

"I rejoice you accept it so amiably. It encourages me. You are free to wander about."

With a laugh I accepted the situation and humorously remarked:

"If your excellency had not placed me on bounds I would have been content to idle away a month here. Now I am itching to go somewhere else."

"That would be unwise—most unhealthy, monsieur. The climate is bad for those who exert themselves. If a man should lose himself I simply call, and the natives, from the Illinois to the mouth of the Mississippi, hear me and look for that man. I shall be pleased to have you dine with me in the cool of the evening. I must leave you now and arrange for the immigrants to start on their journeys, as another ship is due to arrive any time."

I was thinking of the girl in black, and asked:

"What of Mademoiselle Dahlsgaarde? Does she return to France on the Maire, or must she wait until you verify her story?"

He halted and stared at me blankly.

"Her story? Return her to France? God's mercy, but we've already returned two thousand out of the seven thousand sent over by the company! It would require a most excellent story to get mademoiselle back to France."

"Yet decency and justice demand her return if she was illegally seized by the police in their raid," I persisted.

He smiled slightly, and coolly advised:

"Seek some deep shade, monsieur. The sun has made you believe in fairy tales. The young woman made no claim on my indulgence. She said nothing to me about being taken in a raid. It is too much to expect to find a virtuous woman among those frail ones, but she is young and has much room to mend her morals over here; so I shall see her married to one of Monsieur du Pratz's men and sent to a cabin near the Natchez."

I was astounded. The girl had represented herself to me as the victim of an indiscriminate raid. I thought of her soft hands. I thought of the monotonous corn rations, which the Canadian French would eat but which the lower Mississippi French refused, except as a famine diet. I was astounded, I say, and yet why should I expect one of her caste to tell the truth? Nevertheless, there was something infinitely pathetic in picturing one so young and so unused to the wilderness being held a prisoner in the forest cabin of a Dumouy. Her frailty was the fault of her environment. But a lonely Mississippi cabin was a terrible price for her to pay unless the men were similarly punished.

Owing to the disturbing revelations his excellency had made about Damoan the Fox I could not give the girl much of my thoughts. The exigence of my own affairs demanded my most careful attention. So as the governor strode away to the fort I wandered toward the shore to concentrate on my predicament. Damoan was deep in my confidence. It was imperative that my Canadian data should be delivered, and his trip up the Ohio afforded me an excellent and safe opportunity. And I had placed in his hands conclusive evidence of my guilt, and the moment he returned it would not be the galleys, but the noose.

Had it been any other than the Fox I might have retained some hope. But Damoan would be most cunning. I could see him presenting my budget of news and thereby winning Spotswood's confidence. I could see him accepted as my trusted friend, eager to sell France for English gold. He would have my history complete once he finished with my countrymen. Over my head hung the shadow of a noose.

"Monsieur," murmured a voice behind me.

I turned, but there was no one except a lout of a soldier standing with his back to me, the butt of his snaphaunce flintlock resting on the ground, his gaze turned toward the forest-wall. Before I could question him he was softly repeating:

"Do not look at me, monsieur. Something for you under the butt of my musket. Wait till I am gone before you pick it up."

I pretended to watch the small group about Narbonne. I heard the soldier moving away and gave him half a minute before leaning back on one elbow and securing a folded bit of paper stamped into the sand by the gun. Satisfied no spying eyes were on me I opened it. It was written in English, and read:

"Monsieur the Englishman

"Monsieur—I bribed a soldier to give this to you. He promised on the Cross. I must escape up the river and to the English settlements. If there is one generous heart in this horrible land to help me I know the good God will reward. When you get this I shall be on the way to New Orleans. His excellency says I am to mate with a creature of the forest. I either go to the English settlements, or I die.—C. D."

CHAPTER IV

One Reason for Leaving Biloxi.

I tore the message into tiny pieces and buried them deep under the sand, and endeavored to analyze the woman's reasons for so dramatically announcing she must make the English settlements, or die. Why not Canada? Being of Paris I would have expected her to make for Canada, and from there take a boat home. She had made no request to be sent back to France, however, although she had told me she was the victim of a police raid.

I should have felt much better about her could I have reconciled her soft hands with a theory of honest poverty.

However, it was not for me to set up as a moralist; her loneliness and suffering made her human. I knew I should help her if it was within my power.

A voice disturbed my meditations by ironically saying:

"Monsieur is buried beneath admiration for this golden bay. I am told that if one skim off the top six inches of water it changes to solid gold over night."

It was the tattered Narbonne. Back of him was Six Fingers, his parchment face leering malevolently. Farther in the background were several of the women.

I lazily remarked: "You two have composed your differences?" With a nod toward the pirate.

"La! we are brothers!" simpered Narbonne. "He goes with me to my estate. He is to be my gold-steward. You know, we are to find much gold and many precious stones."

Six Fingers came nearer and in English said:

"Monsieur and I start at once for New Orleans. Will you ship with us that far? I know the coast to the east. I know all the Spanish ports. But clew me to the anchor and dump me overboard if I know this d—d river with its many mouths!"

That Narbonne understood my language was shown by his swiftly cutting in:

"We would take it as a great condescension in monsieur. We plan to catch all the wild cattle on my estate and spin their coats into a rare cloth. He who wears a cloak of this wonderful fabric can never grow old and can never be deceived. Think of it, Monsieur Brampton! To never be deceived! It would make one into a god!"

"Let's talk stuff one can understand," growled Six Fingers.

"There is only one subject to be talked in this marvelous land," cried Narbonne. "Ignorant one, do you not realize that the excess of paper money over bullion is a nation's true credit? That France has the most paper money in the world, and therefore must have the greatest credit?"

"Sweet friend, have done with thy cursed chatter," groaned Six Fingers.

The girl's appeal is one to stir any chivalrous heart. How can it be answered?

Giving Him a Lift

A canal boat skipper sat placidly on his rudder handle and smoked, while a horse towed him along the canal. A limping tramp hailed him from the bank.

"Can you give me a lift to the next town, captain?" he asked. "My feet's raw with blisters."

"If I sign you on to the next town, will you agree to work your passage, my lad?"

"I will, captain," said the tramp, eagerly. "My feet—"

The skipper threw a rope ashore.

"Then catch hold o' that rope," he said, "line up alongside the horse, and pull for all you're worth."—London Answers.

SIMPLE FROCKS FOR SPRING; SUMPTUOUS COSTUME BLOUSE

AS IF to accent their gay patternings by way of contrast, many of the now-so-stylish silk print frocks are detailed with solid colored borderings and trimmings. This idea should make definite appeal to the home dressmaker, for it is a simple way of gaining much effectiveness. This popular fabric combination particularly lends itself to the designing of the modish long sleeve.

The model pictured owes its attractiveness to the unique cascade trimming of the silk print bordered with a silk of solid coloring. This silk, which is of American origin, has an interesting bit of history in that the artist who designed it took for his inspiration the tall city skyscraper, applying the idea in colorful design.

Just now considerable interest is being manifested in silk prints which have considerable bright red in their makeup. One can readily conceive that such a silk would be enhanced with a border of solid phantom-red silk, for phantom red is one of the much-talked-of popular shades for this season.

There is great diversity of opinion in regard to silk prints. Some there are who select the most garish and bizarre patterns possible to obtain, while others declare that smart style calls for quaint modest all-over patternings. It is entirely a matter of choice. The important thing is to not neglect the acquiring of a silk print frock for no spring wardrobe is complete without at least one such.

Quite the newest idea is the dress of silk print with a long coat of lightweight cloth or silk of solid color, the lining of which must be of the gay-patterned print. In fact, ensembles which combine a printed dress with a plain coat number among outstanding spring costumes.

Printed crepe de chine in modest design piped with a colorful plain fabric presents a new theme which will be appreciated by the woman of discriminating taste.

A thing of sumptuous beauty, a creation of exotic coloring and intriguing stitchery, is the costume blouse as styled for the spring season. It would seem as if genius had drawn upon all the resources of the world of art and handicraft for "ideas" to appropriate as its own in the designing of the modern tunic or blouse. According to the stylists' way of thinking no color is too gorgeous, no stitchery too complex or ornate, no fabric too magnificent for the making of the blouse which is destined to shed its glory upon many a spring ensemble costume.

If you have a treasured panel of Chinese embroidery, if your friend across seas has remembered you with a gift of gay peasant cross-stitchery, if you have in your possession a length of colorful metal brocade, hoard them no longer in the secret recesses of your faithful cedar chest; far better let them serve in the cause of a handsome and costly looking blouse.

For the woman of fashion who is planning a new and elaborate blouse the models in the picture should prove inspirational. The one to the left has a panel of bois de rose suede cloth introduced simulating a vestee form. The embroidery on the cloth and the heavy crepe de chine which forms the rest of the garment is in multicoloring with a preponderance of metal threadwork.

Silver metal cloth elaborately patterned in stitchery and with a discreet showing of beadwork in connection with colorful metal floss, produces a blouse model of fascinating design, as shown to the right in the illustration.

Quite a little hand-painting appears on the dressy satin blouse. The blouse of all-over lace dyed to match the suit with which it is worn is also registered among winsome types. As to the blouse of gay silk print or brilliant plaid, its vogue is already assured. Very charming with the spring tailleur is the vestee or blouse of fine tucked or plaited flesh-colored satin.

Board To Elect Teachers Next

he first important duty of the ly organized board at their next ting will be to elect teachers for coming year.

n our opinion this is the most ortant piece of business which es before the schol board during year.

t this meeting the board should extra precaution—not only are then juggling with the taxpay- money, but even more are they gling with the welfare of school dren. We wil explain just what mean as we are very interested he affairs ofo ur school and we t the very best here.

ow, at this time the board is to de wether or not to retain the vices of our present teachers for ther year, o to hie new ones to e their places. And this is the important step to be taken.

We have had more or less trouble h teachers the past few years, in t they did not come up to stan- d—they were not what they were resented to be and their recom- ndations from other boards were y mis-leading.

However, this year the board was y fortunate in getting very good chers in both the grades and the h school and affairs at school s year have gone very smoothly. e teachers we have are all very d in their school work and the ldren have shown unusual pro- ss in school work. The teachers rk well together with the board the parents, and we have heard kick from anyone about school s year.

No doubt at this time the board s perhaps fifty or maybe a hun- d applications from teachers all r the state, but that means but le. No doubt each one of the plicants has fifty or more appli- ions sent to other schools. And w-a-days it is hard to tell whether nott he recommendations are sin- re. Many boards will give a tea- er a fine recommendation merely get rid of her in a pleasant way. at is a fact and our board here s been stung that way more than ce.

What Is The Safe Thing To Do?

It then appears that teachers can- t be hired on the strength of her commendation, so what can the ard do?

In as much as the teachers 'his ar have given the best of satisfac- on the wise thing for the board to is to re-elect the teachers that ve given saisfaction and give them substantial increase in salary. It far cheaper to give them all a ise than to hire a teacher we know thing about and then later find e does not come up to standard. e taxpayers loose money on her d worst of all the children are the es who really suffer the most. We nnot afford to have our children the sufferers for a few paltry doll- rs.

A teacher who has proven her orth should be rewarded with a ise in salary every year she stays ere—that will solve the question of getting good teachers and it is also the cheapest way.

We think special care should be used in getting grade teachers. The grades are the foundation of our education system and in any construction the foundation should be built strong. A poor beginning will prove a handicap throughout school for a pupil. Of course the high school is and should be of just as great importance, but when a pupil enters the high school they are thrown on their own resources more and are better able to look out for themselves. At least they should. Many pupils, unfortunately, do not go any further than the eighth grade and so, for another reason, the grades should be well built.

We will watch carefully the outcome of the board's action on their election of teachers. The board is representative of the patrons of the school and we do not stand alone in the opinions we have expressed on the teacher question.

GET PIGS ON CLEAN GROUNDS

Dr. Stouder Says it May Determine Whether Crop Will Be Profitable or Money Loser

"If you wish to raise a satisfactory and profitable crop of pigs this spring, you had better plan on getting the pigs on clean grounds rather than to try and raise them in the old, worm and disease-infested lots" says Dr. K. W. Stouder, extension veterinarian of Iowa State College, who has worked in all parts of Iowa in recent years and has observed the effect of clean grounds on the pig crop.

Here are some of the suggestions which are offered to insure a healthy crop of pigs that will "do well" from the time they are farrowed Clean the pens thoroly with a hoe and broom and scald them with a solution made up of 1 can of lye to 30 gallons of boiling water. Do this before bedding down for the sow to farrow.

Bed the farrowing pens with clean bedding and wash the sow with soap and water before she is put in the pen, being particularly careful if the sow has run in the old lots. Keep the pens clean after farrowing, using good clean bedding and if necessary, confine the sows and pigs to the cleaned, scalded pens until they are big enough to go to clean lots or pasture.

Remove the pigs and sows to clean pastures in wagons or crates, to avoid traveling over old hog lots. If you can leave the old lots idle for a year, haul all the manure and plow them. They will then be much safer place to handle pigs or shoats in the future.

Old hog lots plowed and seeded to rape, sudan or any other crop hastens the clean-up and renovation and provides some feed for the labor expended.

Keep the pigs away from the old lots until they are at least 5 months old when it is reasonably safe to return them to feeding floors and the old hog house for shelter if necessary.

"These measures hav proven successful in controlling the comon parasites and bowel infections of pigs" says Dr. Stouder. "They will do as much for you. It is not claimed that these measures control hog cholera, but vaccination will."

Weeds Claim Two Million Acres

Noxious weeds ocupy one-tenth of the entire cropping area of Iowa, or a total of about 2,000,000 acres, according to M. H. Burns, plant disease and weed specialist with the Extension Service of Iowa State College. Some of the most troublesome weeds are: Canada thistle, quack grass, horse nettle, velvet weed, buffalo burr and perennial sow thistle.

Mr. Burns says that the eradication of weeds is a comunity problem and requires the coopeiation of the entire locality.

THE HEN is one of the best money makers on the farm and the back yards of the country when she is well bred, well fed and comfortably housed, declares the Blue Valley Creamery Institute after a careful study of the 1925 poultry situation. The above chart, prepared by the Institute, tells its own story. It shows the results of culling poor layers from the flock, feeding them a balanced ration and keeping them in a modern type, fresh-air poultry house. Flocks of poultry properly cared for make three times as much profit per hen as flocks handled carelessly, the Institute experts state. Pure-bred fowls of known production ancestry should be used. Chicks should be hatched so they will be matured and laying before the high-price egg season. Only healthy, strong, big-bodied pullets and hens with deep bodies and widespread ribs and pelvic formation should be used in the laying and breeding pens. Skim milk has been found to be the cheapest source of egg-making proteins that can be obtained on the average farm.

EARLY BIRDS LAY THE EGGS

Exporiments Show Date of Hatching Governs Egg Yield

It's the early hatched pullets that lay the eggs. This was proven rather conclusively in experiments conducted by the Iowa Agricultural Experiment Station at Ames. These experiments which have been running for several years lead the station workers to say: "One of the chief causes of low yearly egg production and few if any eggs during the winter is late hatching."

In the tests measuring the value of early hatching, records on White Rocks hatched March 1, April 1, May 1and June 1 were kept. The pullets used were all from the same flock and were handled in exactly the same manner. The only difference was in the hatching dates.

The records show that the pullets hatched March 1 laid an average of 217.5 eggs each during the year, as compared to 171.67 eggs for the April hatched pullets, 117.83 eggs for the May 1 pullets, and 53.7 for the June 1 hatches. The profits from the various lots of pullets followed the egg yield. Those hatched March 1 returned annual profits of $3.56 each; April 1, $2.56; May 1, $1.24; and June 1, $0.02 per bird.

STUDYING RADIO INTERFERENCE

Experiments Being Conducted To Do Away With This Annoyance

The engineering experiment station of Iowa State College, has inaugurated an extensive investigation and study of the causes of radio interference. J. K. McNeely, research profesor of electrical engineering, will supervise the study.

This movement has received hearty endorsement from central station electric men throughout the state. Electric companies have been spending thousands of dollars this past winter in efforts to investigate the claims of radio fans that power lines are causing interference.

So little is known about the real cause of interference and trouble makers are so difficult to find that any authoritive information on the subject is invaluable.

The problem has reached such national importance that Secretary Hoover is reported to be about ready to call upon individuals and institutions over the country to aid in the determination of the causes of interference and their remedies.

It is now known that radio sets themselvs often set up and radiate the same type of interference as that popularly attributed to power lines. It is also known that household appliances, when defective, have a very troublesome effect on radio receiv-

The problem of the experimenters at Ames will be to classify the several causes of interference and determine the distance over which they are effective. Following this work an attempt will be made to discover methods of shielding the electric units to prevent trouble.

WEATHER RECORDS 106 YEARS OLD

The first known weather records that were kept in Iowa started in Council Bluffs on October 22, 1819. Much has been said about the weather of pioneer days but meteorologists learner long ago that memories were treacherous unless supported by records based on readings of accurate instruments.

There is a wealth of old weather records in Iowa but those prior to 1890 had never been compiled so that they could be compared to modern records, until the Weather and Crop Bureau of the Iowa Department of Agriculture started this important task two years ago.

The resuls of this investigation back to 1873 are being published monthly in co-operation with the U. S. Weather Bureau. These interesting old facts may be had by addressing a request to the Weather Bureau Office, Des Moines, Iowa.

MANY PLACES CHANGED HANDS MARCH FIRST

CAREFUL, KITE FLYERS!

There Is Great Danger In Flying Kites Over Electric Wires

The annual warnings to kite flyers are being broadcast this month by Electric Companies of the state.

Several fatalities have resulted in the state in the past few years because boys fyling kites have permitted them to become entangled with high tension electric lines and in some way have had communicated to them the fatal voltage of the power line.

The electric companies warn all boys not to fly kites in the vicinity of power lines. They particularly stress the danger of flying a kite with any form of wire in place of the customary cotton string. The wire will instantly conduct the current to the kie flyer if i touches a power line.

Many companies have volunteered to extricate kites that become tangled in the wires rather than have the boys themselves attempt this dangerous feat.

Parents are being urged to impress upon their children the dangers attendant to kite flying.

ADVISES EATING MORE CHEESE

Americans Do Not Properly Appreciate Its Food Value

The high food value and palatability of properly made cheese is not fully appreciated by the American people, says E. F. Goss of the Dairy Department at Iowa State College. Among the larger nations the United States is ninh in cheese consumption.

Mr. Goss states that cheese is valuable as a food product ecause f itsh igh protein content. Whole milk cheese carries large amounts of milk fat which is valuable for its heat producing qualities and also for the fact that it contains large numbers of the vitamin, A. This vitamin is very essential to growth and well being.

One of the most easily made cheeses, according to Mr. Goss, is cottage cheese. It is made by allowing the skimmilk to curdle at a temperature of about 70 or 90 degrees F. As soon as firm curd has been formed the mass is broken and stirred. The temperature is increased while the stirring proceeds. When the temperature has reached from 100 to 120 degrees, the whey should separate from the curd. The mixture is then placed upon a cheese cloth or open texture fabric which will allow the whey to drain off. As the last of the whey drains off, cold water is thrown over the curd which gives a milder flavored cheese. Salt is added at the rate of about 1 ounce to 4 or 5 lbs of curd.

MAY RAISE PRICES ON FARM PRODUCTS

Leaders Offer New Plan; Ask Government for Loan of $250,000,000

Washington—Legislative action to meet the demands of agriculture by providing means of raising the prices of farm products in the domestic markets of the United States, has taken definite form. At a hearing by the house committee on agriculture, corn belt delegates and representatives of leading farm organizations agreed on the terms of a bill to control surplus farm products and effect price stabilization. The bill, drawn up by the Des Moines corn belt committee of twenty-two, was submitted to the house committee for the consideration of congress.

Although in the main the provisions of the bill are along the lines laid down in the Dickinson measure, it goes much further. It provides that the government shall advance $250,000,000, or as much more as may be required for a "revolving fund" to operate the price-raising machinery. Reimbursement of the government is provided for in money to be contributed by the producers.

The plan of operation proposes that a farm board appointed by the President shall cause the price of farm products to be bid up to levels which will mean reasonable profits for the producers. Provision is made that any losses resulting from the purchase of surpluses in the home market at the bid-up prices, and sale abroad at lower world prices, be met from funds provided by the collection of "equalization fees" from the producers.

In the case of live stock prices, congress may be asked to make the packing concerns public utilities, or to stipulate that the charges for the services they perform shall be regulated by the board so as to give a reasonable profit only. This provision is similar to the power of the Interstate Commerce commission, which allows railroads to make rates yielding average profits of 5¾ per cent.

The bill calls for the formation of a federal farm advisory council of five representatives in each of the twelve federal land bank districts, the representatives to be elected by farm service organizations. The body, which is to serve without remuneration, is empowered to nominate three persons from each land bank district, from which the President is to choose one each to form the federal farm board of twelve members. The board's responsibility is to operate the price-raising machinery through farmers' co-operative organizations or other agencies.

WASHINGTON BRIEFS

The year 1925 was the most prosperous the Philippine government has experienced since the slump that followed the ending of the World war. It is semi-officially stated that when the books are balanced the revenues will show a surplus over expenditures of approximately $3,500,000.

The condition of Gen. John J. Pershing, after two weeks' treatment by medical and dental specialists in Walter Reed hospital, has returned to normal.

The Navajo Indians of Arizona must pay half the cost of a $200,000 bridge across the Colorado river near Lee ferry, the senate decided in finally approving the conference report on the $425,000,000 deficiency bill.

Granting of honorable discharges to soldiers who enlisted during the World war and who were dismissed because of misrepresentation of age, is provided in a bill passed by the house.

President Coolidge feels that it is up to congress to determine whether the "lame duck" session immediately after each congressional election should be abolished, and if a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment to this effect is passed by both houses he will approve it.

COOLIDGE'S FIRST YEAR IN OWN RIGHT

President Is Now Enjoying Excellent Health.

Washington.—President Coolidge has rounded out his first year as occupant of the White House in his own right. In all he has served more than two and one-half years as chief executive, his elevation to that office upon the death of Warren G. Harding preceding by nineteen months his inauguration last March 4 as a President elected by the people.

Reviewing the last year, President Coolidge has the satisfaction of realizing that two of his major recommendations for congress—adherence to the world court and tax reduction—had been acted upon.

He was hopeful that a number of other legislative proposals he has sponsored will be enacted into law before the close of the present session.

A loser in his fight last spring to have Charles B. Warren of Michigan confirmed as attorney general, Mr. Coolidge faces a possible rejection by the senate of three other nominations, those of Wallace McCamant of Oregon, who nominated him for vice president at the 1920 Republican convention, to be a federal Circuit judge; Thomas F Woodlock of New York, to be a member of the Interstate Commerce commission, and Charles W. Hunt of Iowa, to be a member of the federal trade commission.

The White House grind which has worn down more than one President apparently has had no ill effect on Mr. Coolidge. He is enjoying excellent health, having recovered from the cold which sent him to bed recently for two days. He weighs as much, if not more than he did on entering the White House, although he takes no outdoor exercise except evening strolls through the business section of the capital, and goes through a daily ordeal of shaking hands with dozens to hundreds of visitors, apparently enjoying it.

Omaha Sniper Pleads Insanity; Killed Two

Omaha, Neb.—Insanity, the plea which is so popular among killers in Chicago, is to be the defense of Frank Carter, the sniper who terrorized Omaha with his little .22 rifle equipped with a silencer. He has already pleaded "not guilty."

Carter is under the observation of state alienists who say he is exceptionally cunning. He will be prosecuted for first degree murder and the state will ask the extreme penalty, which is death in the electric chair.

Among Carter's victims were Dr. Austin D. Searles, a wealthy Omaha physician, and William McDevitt, both of whom were shot to death through the brain while peaceably at their business. Walter Pterson, a young man, was shot at and missed so narrowly that the bullet clipped his lip. His subsequent speed in getting out of the vicinity doubtless saved his life.

ut imagination can conjure up at a magnificent improvement hu-nity could make, if it could afford do that. All the underpinning—ways, sewers, conduits and under-ound conveniences (including ga-es), established first.

Then boulevards 200 to 300 feet de with tree-planted malls in the nter, frequent open squares down-wn, adorned with fountains and atues; railroad depots exactly where u wanted them; business districts mpactly and monumentally built; yscraper apartments, thickly inter-ersed with parks; it's all a grand ea but, alack, costing billions.

Cities are not "thought out" that y; they are rather organic growths, much so as if they were subject the laws of nature; to be trimmed, etored, yea, even amputated, as ey show their physical failings that eds must be remedied.—Exchange.

Small Towns Profit

Congestion of automobiles in the ties is proving a benefit to small-wn merchants. Many of the lesser mmunities report that parking re-rictions in large and middle-sized ties is hindering the small-town buy-who used to go to the city to shop. pparently traffic and parking diffi-lties are making it hard for shop-ers to buy in the city, and they are aying at home. Marysville, Ohio, is town of about 12,000 inhabitants, st 30 miles from Columbus. Mer-ants in this community report that, nce parking and traffic have become complicated in Columbus, many eople are not going to the larger city nd Marysville merchants are pros-ering.

A very interesting plan to aid the t-of-town buyer and to prevent park-g restrictions from hurting the local erchants has been evolved through e retail merchants' bureau of Blue-eld, W Va. In this enterprising city one-hour parking limit is strictly nforced in business districts. An t-of-town buyer coming to the city, owever, receives a special tag to lace on his car Police authorities ote this tag and will not take action the parking limit is violated.—Na-on's Business Magazine.

Clean Factories Count

Clean factories and offices mean lean homes. It comes natural to a an who works in clean surroundings o keep his hands and his clothing as lean as his job permits. He takes ride in his appearance, and he has o have a home worthy of it. That xplains why so many cities are los-ng their slums. It isn't that land-ords have reformed; it is because la-or will no longer live in unsanitary urroundings. The clean factory is a esson to the immigrant used to quator. It is a great help in the Americanization movement.

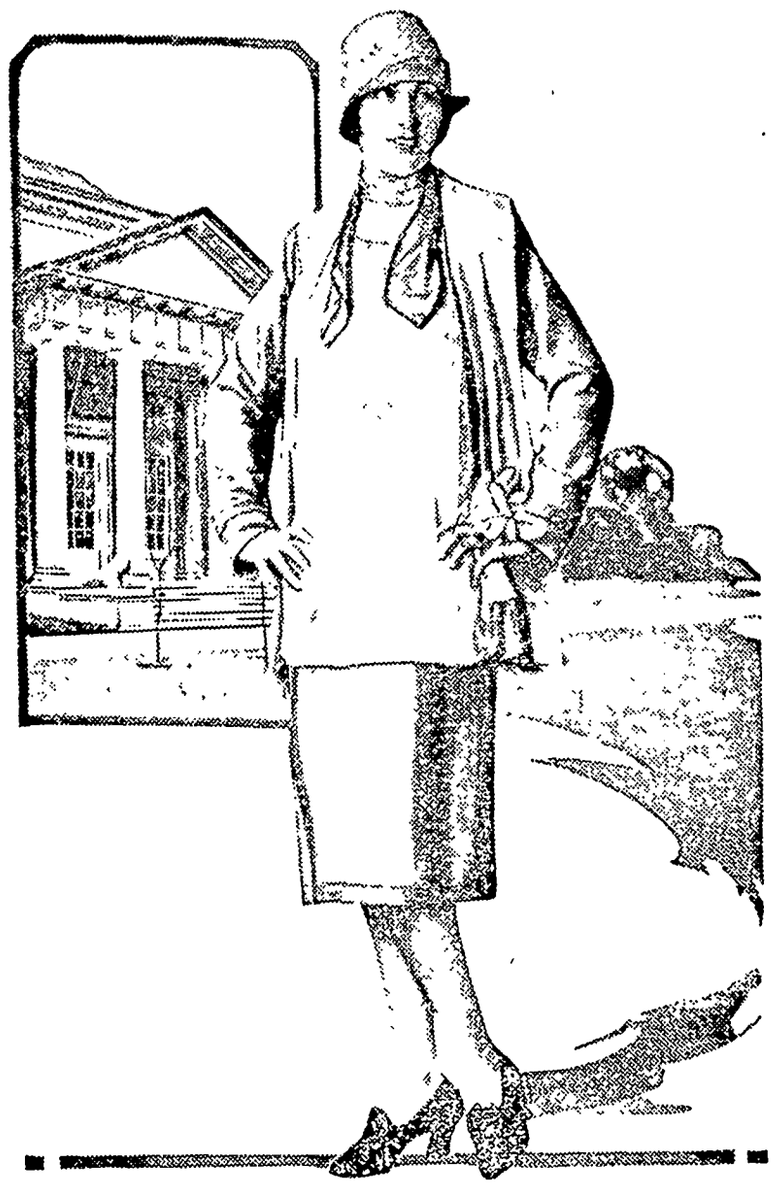
Bird Sanctuaries Pay

The value of bird sanctuaries which o greatly increase the bird popula-ion is at once apparent. Two birds an kill in a single day more insects han two men with a compressed air prayer in an orchard or a farmer with a two-horse duster in a field. Bird refuges in such places as state arks, town or county forests, or on rivate property should be encouraged y farmers more than by any other lass. The more birds the fewer in ects.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

VOGUE FAVORS SOFT-LINE SUITS; SELF-TRIMS FOR THE FELT HAT

THE task of selecting a new spring costume isn't going to be a task at all. It's going to prove a delightful experience. Couldn't be otherwise with everything pertaining to the vogue so joyously springlike in material, coloring and styling Even the most blase fashion connoisseur is due to find thrills in the doings of the mode this season. At sight of the gay togs for spring one's spirit just naturally tunes into a spring song of gladsome appreciation for the styles that be.

Along with the rest of our apparel the tailored spring suit has departed from the severity of its ways, having taken on marvelous pastel coloring while both materials and styling are distinctly novel. Of course one may wear a man-tailored navy cloth suit and be up in the foremost rank of fashion, for there is a revival of navy this spring, but one may also wear a "dusty" mauve or an almond green, a bois de rose or some equally as delectable a pastel colored tweed tailleur and be attired quite as much to the mode's liking.



Chic Suit Has Color Fascination.

In the new models there is a tendency to feminized tailoring, which is most flattering in its youthful soft lines. Analyzing the chic suit in the picture from the standpoint of charm, firstly, it has color fascination being made of a novelty silk and wool tweed in two tones of green of the almond cast. Secondly, with it is worn a tunic blouse which is of printed silk crepe in exotic coloring, for crepe prints, mind you, are the last word in silken fabrics. Thirdly, this blouse interprets the vogue for fine plaits—which suggests the idea "when in doubt" have your spring tunic plaited. for plaits have taken on a new lease of life, playing a most important role throughout the designing of new clothes. Lastly, the crowning touch of smartness is achieved in the metal fabric tie wrapped choker fashion about the throat. The latest novelty is a scarf of this sort which resembles a tie and is worn tied about the throat as pictured or with a bow at the side with flowing ends. Plaid taffeta ties with tailored suits or coats are tres chic.

Attractive soft-line suits which are youthful show a coat of solid colored cloth worn with a plaited skirt of plaid or stripe material. Later these fancy plaited skirts will be topped with plain cloth capes which are lined with novelty material to match the skirt. Both capes and coats are apt to be finished with scarf collars.

Just as the felt hat seems about to retire from the millinery scene, back it comes again to the center of the fashion stage with some new intriguing act to perform. At present moment inventive genius and a pair of scissors are upholding the reputation of the felt chapeau as an outstanding number on the leading spring style programs.

The newer felt hats feature novelty in that they are slashed and folded and cut into pieces and then put together again with a nicety that gives them an appearance more charming than ever Milliners have a knack of cutting away one portion and grafting it somewhere else in the form of applique or a perky bow or a flange or in some trimming way that insures a sustained style interest.

Handsome effects are attained by appliquing felt upon felt as the large hat in the picture so effectively demonstrates. There are added notes of decoration if one embellish the fruit or flower applique with hand-painting. The model illustrated is in an exquisite parme violet shade.

A clever treatment of felt is accomplished by slashing a given portion at regular intervals, then twirling each narrow strip under a row of firm stitching. The small hat to the left below shows how highly decorative this self-trim is.

The third hat is interesting because it is finished in a tailored way with three embroidered arrowheads, same as are employed on the cloth tailleur.

Increasing interest is manifested in hand-painted felt hats. Modernistic design is carried out in vividly colored and gilded conventional patternings. Also pastel felts are exquisitely detailed with flower painting done in nature's colorings. Cut-out work, the openings lined with gilded leather, varies the felt mode very attractively.

In answer to spring's call for straw, a pretty compromise is made in that bangkok and crochet visca-straw hats have brims of felt with an all-over applique of felt. Cut-outs trim the crown. Some milliners are using felt shapes as a foundation for ribbon flower-work and beaded ornamentation.

To Ignore the Early Warnings of Kidney Trouble Is Serious and Often Fatal

ONE'S health depends upon one's kidneys. The kidneys must filter every drop of blood. If they fail to properly do this work, there's a poisoning of the whole system. Then comes backache, dizzy spells, bladder irregularities and loss of vitality. Why wait? Why not use Doan's Pills? Doan's have helped thousands. Ask your neighbor!

"Those bilious headaches can be prevented"

"I know how agonizing they are. For years I was a chronic sufferer.

"And the headaches were not the worst part of it. The strong drugs I used to take to relieve the pain upset my stomach and slowly but surely undermined my general health.

METHODIST CHURCH NOTES
A. W. Gauger, Pastor

Last Sundoy we had our first stormy Sunday for this winter. The effect was noticable in the attendance in both the preaching service as well as in the Sunday school. However, we had a most profitable service in the morning. Coming in like a lion, March will perhaps go out like a lamb. With the return of milder weather we look for the return of some of our shut-ins to our regular services. We assure them that we have missed them. And, while our services have been well attended still we shall be glad to have them enjoy the services with God's people.

We are hoping to observe the Passion week with special services this year—leading up to a joyous Easter. Definite announcements will be made later. At that time the sacrament of baptism will be administered to a class of little Newcomers in our midst. We are glad for these baby boys and girls that have come to gladden the several homes.

Likewise we are laying plans for our Vacation Bible Schools, in both Klemme and Liberty. Last year they proved such a splendid success that we are planning to carry this work on in a larger way this year. Beside giving instruction in catechism work we plan to have a bible story contest as well as memory work. Church history, and Christian service instruction will be of special help and interest.

EARLY SPRINGS OF LONG AGO

Exceptionally mild weather in February has set many of the older people talking about "way back in the '70's and '80's when seeding (mostly wheat) was done in February."

The Weather and Crop Bureau of the Iowa Department of Agriculture states that this could be possible only when he average temperature of February was about the normal for March, or, in other words when the season was about a month early.

Such conditions occured in 1877, 1878 and 1882.Nothing approaching this mildness appears in the fifty-four Februarys of record until 1921 and 1926. These early springs of long ago so impressed pioneer settlers that they now refer to February seeding as "customary in those days"

Confidence in Self Man's Biggest Asset

Life is an island, entirely surrounded by risks, losses, troubles, hardships and misadventures of all sorts.

Most men go to pieces when they have had a few beatings. They wilt. They fade away. They crawl into a safe little corner and hide, while the great rough tide of glorious life rushes past them.

The fact is that defeat is the normal thing in this haphazard little world, and victory comes but seldom. Every victory, usually, is the result of a long series of defeats.

A man must have faith in himself and in what he is trying to do. He must say: "I can." He must back himself to win. He must bet on himself. He must have faith in the people he works with. He must believe in his team. He must see the better side of his co-workers and not think that his own point of view is the only right one.

He must have faith in those great principles that make us superior to the animals of the forest—to Truth, Honesty, Sympathy, Justice, Progress.—Forbes Magazine.

Duchess of Fontanges

Marie Angelique, duchess of Fontanges, was the successor to Mme. Montespan in the favor of Louis XIV. "She was beautiful as an angel, but silly as a goose," said Abbe Choisi of her. She, nevertheless, captivated the affections of Louis XIV, who was tired of Mme. de Montespan.

As soon as she had discovered the passion she had inspired in the king, she became haughty and extravagant, spending at times as much as 100,000 crowns a month. She became the general dispenser of the king's favors and the model of fashion. She was made a duchess by the king, but did not long enjoy the rank, since she died at the age of twenty, in the abbey of Port Royal, at Paris.—Chicago Journal.

Present and Absent

A curious instance of Israel Zangwill's absent-mindedness came to my notice the other day. He was rehearsing one of his plays at the Scala, and arrived punctual to the minute on the stage. Taking up his position he opened the prompt copy and addressed an empty stage as follows: "I am here to the minute. Why is it that no member of my company can be as punctual?" At that moment his stage manager, who had been searching for him, put in an appearance, and gently reminded him that the rehearsal was in the foyer, where the entire company was already waiting for him!—London Mail.

Early Rising Duke

The duke of Wellington was a very early riser. His early habit of punctuality is pleasingly illustrated in the following anecdote: "I will take care to be present at five tomorrow morning," said the engineer of New London bridge, in acceptance of the duke's request that he would meet him at that hour. "Say a quarter before five," replied the duke, with a quiet smile. "I owe all I have achieved to being ready a quarter of an hour before it was deemed necessary to be so, and I learned that lesson when I was a boy."

The Nervous System

The human nervous system is really a living telegraph line made up of electrical condensers, thinks Dr. W. R. Whitney of the General Electric Co., according to Science. This idea is sharply disputed by scientists, who say that nerve messages do not travel at the speed of electricity, but Doctor Whitney demonstrated with condenser apparatus that the transit time of a message can be slowed down even to three seconds, a time much longer than the known nerve reaction time of a human being.

A CLOSE CALL

SYNOPSIS.—Traveling by canoe on the Mississippi, on his way to Biloxi, in the early days of the settlement of Louisiana, William Brampton, English spy, known to Indians and settlers as the "White Indian," sees a Natchez Indian post a declaration of war against the French. For his own purposes, he hastens to Biloxi to carry the news to Bienville, French governor. Brampton meets an old friend, Joe Labrador, Indian halfbreed, who warns him Bienville has threatened to hang him as a spy. Brampton refuses to turn back. He falls in with Jules and Basile Mattor, on their way to Biloxi to secure wives frem a ship, the Maire, bringing women from France. At Biloxi Brampton protects a woman from a sergeant's brutality. She tells him she is Claire Dahlsgaarde, picked up in a raid in Paris. Evidently well bred and educated she is a mystery to Brampton. He intervenes to prevent a man, English, known as "Old Six Fingers," following her to New Orleans. A Frenchman, Francois Narbonne, slightly demented by stories he has heard of the riches of the New World, introduces himself. Bienville accuses Brampton of treachery, but the latter secures a respite from death by revealing the Natchez declaration of war. He is to await the aarival of a former companion, Damoan the Fox, who will exonerate or condemn him. Damoan has documents proving Brampton an English spy. Brampton receives a message from Claire begging him to help her reach the English settlements.

Then to me: "Do you ship with us?"

"You two are free to go and come as you will. I cannot go with you. I am sorry. If you will ask for one Jean Dumouy, Monsieur du Pratz's boatman, you can bargain with him to take you to Bayou St. Jean, and from there you can easily make the settlement."

"Monsieur Brampton is very polite," sighed Narbonne. "I had hoped for your gracious company. Come, old rat, we must find this boatman."

They started toward the fort, with the women making after them eager to beg a passage to New Orleans, which I believe they thought to be a miniature Paris. Narbonne waved them aside and they fastened upon Six Fingers, and while the old pirate was busy in fighting them off the Frenchman returned swiftly to my side and asked:

'Mademoiselle in black? She has gone?"

"To la Nouvelle Orleans," I informed him. "What do you know of her?"

"Only that I pity her. Only that she is alone in the world and very sad. Only that she is in great fear of my brother, the corsair. He keeps with me, thinking I am interested in her I keep with him that he may not find her first and add to her fright. What a game! I hope to see him die, and I will defend him from harm until I learn why the little sad one is afraid of him. I regret. But if monsieur cannot go, then he cannot."

This last was for Six Fingers' benefit as he had now got rid of the women and ran back with his ears pricked to learn what we were discussing.

"Impossible, monsieur; but I wish you well in your endeavors,'" I said.

And with a sweep of his cap the eccentric fellow took his departure and went to find Dumouy.

Narbonne might be mad, but there was no doubting the kindly qualities of his heart. I slowly made for the fort, pausing at the entrance to reconnoiter the square. It was now quite dark. On the left and next to the gate was the governor's quarters, and through an open window came the sound of his measured voice. A candle was lighted, and I saw Narbonne standing by the window.

Passing on to the magazine and guardhouse on the right and at the back of the enclosure I halted before a small office adjoining the magazine, in which burned a candle. The room was empty, and I entered, and found what I was looking for—writing material.

Those few soldiers who were not on duty were gambling and gossiping in their barracks. The lighted candle evidenced the return of the governor, or his superintendent; and I made haste to finish my business. For a variety of reasons I could not explain my predicament, and had to content myself with saying:

"Mademoiselle Claire Dahlsgaarde: There is much danger, and yet there is no insurmountable obstacle for a young woman desiring to travel through this country. At present I am detained here. I hope to leave very soon, when my best service will be at your command. I may arrive at New Orleans during the night. I may send word by a friend, whose passport shall be the words "The White Indian," and he will bring you to me. It will be necessary for me to start north immediately. I respectfully direct your attention to the Indian woman's dress, which is adapted to woods and river-travel. I remain your respectful servant—Wm. Brampton."

As I was hurriedly rereading it I became conscious of being watched. As I sat there with the message before me I knew some one was behind me.

Picking up the quill I dipped it in ink and began writing:

"To his excellency, Monsieur Philippe de Vaudreuil, Governor of Canada.

"Monsieur: I find myself most unjustly accused of serving the interest of the English colonies to the hurt of France. You, your excellency, who have been so well acquainted with my activities, and who, I flatter myself, have always given me favorable consideration in estimating—"

"That paper, if you please, Monsieur Brampton," rang out the cold voice of Bienville.

With assumed surprise I wheeled about. The muzzle of a flintlock pistol of large bore was resting on the sill of the window, and behind it was the stern, implacable and suspicious countenance of the governor. As I twisted to face the window my body masked the table. My hand gathered up the message to the young woman and, as I brought up my foot, shoved it inside my moccasin.

"Why—why, your excellency! This is intolerable. You aim weapons at me! I protest—"

"Enough, Monsieur Brampton!" sharply interrupted the governor. "Where his gracious majesty's affairs are involved I cannot stand on the punctilios of courtesy. Both hands where I can see them. Sergeant, bring me what he has been writing."

"I have it, your excellency; all that he has written," said the sergeant.

The pistol vanished, and Bienville entered the small office and without a glance at me took the sheet of paper and held it to the candle-light. I frowned and waited; and in less than a minute I had the satisfaction of seeing his lips pursed in chagrin.

"That Paper, If You Please, Monsieur Brampton," Rang Out the Cold Voice of Bienville.

Replacing the paper on the table, he said:

"You may go, sergeant."

After Suarez had departed the governor said to me:

"It was a disagreeable necessity. Had you come to my quarters to do your writing my suspicions might not have been aroused. But, entering here, as if to escape espionage—"

He ceased speaking and drummed his fingers on the table, having approached as near to an apology as he cared to do.

"But what good could such a memorial do you? Long before it could be delivered and answered I should have passed on your case. In no event does Monsieur Vaudreuil have jurisdiction over Biloxi. If innocent, you will not have long to wait. If guilty, your petition could help you none."

"Your excellency is in the right of it, as you always are," I sighed; and I began feeding the petition into the candle.

"That is finished," he said. "If you will dine with me we shall be served at once.

I rose and bowed and stood aside for him to precede me through the door. I feared I should have no opportunity of speaking to Narbonne; but as we walked toward the governor's quarters I heard the well-known voice raised in a spirited harangue, the audience being a group of grinning soldiers at the gate. Dumouy and his companion were just outside the gate and impatient to be off.

That Narbonne and Six Fingers had struck their bargain was shown by the boatmen's lingering, although in great impatience. Narbonne glimpsed me on the edge of the circle and abruptly ended his talk and pressed forward to greet me. Bienville stood a few paces ahead of me; and I kicked up my foot and retrieved the message and crumpled it in my hand.

"I regret I shall not have your company, monsieur," he cried.

"Monsieur Narbonne, I am always ready to do you a service," I heartily replied, "and at some other time it may be my good fortune to have you command me."

And I extended my hand and gave him a warm English handclasp. I felt his hand jerk as the wad of paper pressed into the palm. Undoubtedly the fellow was mad, and yet on subjects apart from the Mississippi country he could be sane enough. My nerves ceased jumping as I felt him palming the paper.

"It has been good to meet you, monsieur," he somewhat stiffly returned. "Till we meet again at my plantation. I shall go in much for silkworms, using the Indian girls and children for the delicate task of caring for the worms."

And with one of his exaggerated bows, he was backing toward the sullen pirate and the impatient boatman.

Sieur de Bienville was charming. He referred in no way to my dubious position, and he extended to me those little attentions that are so natural in his race, and which, I am forced to believe, must spring from an innate kindness of heart. Only once was my personal standing involved in our table talk, and that when I ventured to ask:

"Is there any objection to my visiting Mobile while waiting for Damoan's report?"

"Be patient a bit, and perhaps we can go there together." (Meaning, of course if Damoan gave me a clean slate.)

His manner discouraged further requests, and as if to avoid a recurrence of the subject he entered on a lively discourse upon the English and the French manner of occupying a country. "The priest was the first of the French to visit aborigines and the trader was first of my people," he said. This led him into warm praise of the Jesuits, whom he greatly admired, although he readily admitted they never exercised the same influence over the lower river Indians as they did over the Canadian.

In referring to Father Davion, driven in by the Tunicas, and to Father Foucault, killed by the Koroas, he revealed the inexorable side of his nature, his "blood for blood" judgments, by reminding me with much relish how he paid liberal rewards for the murderers' scalps. It was his one strong point in his management of the Indian tribes, for which they knew him as the "Iron Hand." As blood for blood was the aboriginal point of view the policy always had their respect even when demanding toll.

He sneered at Cadillac for not suspecting that the silver found in the lake country was carried there from Mexico; and in the next breath he expressed absolute confidence in all of Law's plans. He pictured Law finding a bankrupt empire, an unpaid army and a starving peasantry, with the billets d'etat going to a discount of seventy per cent, and then boasted of how the magician had eliminated, or changed these evils. Now the peasants could make fortunes. Luxuries were within the reach of all who would reach for them, regardless of former poverty. France was feverishly prosperous. Paris was the center of the world.

And yet he was firm in his conviction that the future of Louisiana lay in agriculture, not in mines; and he insisted that the colonists should be selected with this thought in view.

I refused a bed in his quarters, for I was his prisoner. Nor did I care to be too much under his thumb should I discover an opportunity of escaping. So, after his courteous good night, I went to the barracks, where Sergeant Suarez sullenly showed me a bunk. Very soon I decided my outdoor life had unfitted me for sleeping under cover. I took my robes and went outside and arranged my bed under the oaks. As I lay down three figures passed me and took up positions between me and the shore, the woods to the north and the woods to the west. Doubtless there were sharp eyes between me and the woods at the east.

This espionage was extremely irritating. It accented the danger of my being in Biloxi when Damoan the Fox arrived. My report on Canada, so idiotically confided to the Fox, was my death warrant. That one slip left me powerless to face the fellow down did he return. How completely he had deceived me was shown by my trusting the data to his care.

The danger from the Fox had seemed rather remote until the sentinels surrounded me that night; then it closed about me and smothered me, and I remained awake for hours trying to arrive at some sensible plan for leaving Biloxi and reaching New Orleans and keeping my appointment with the girl. When the sun rose I had advanced a single step. I would give the impression I was interested in Pensacola. That would be my logical haven if I tried to escape.

That morning I simulated cunning in my way of questioning different men about Pensacola, the time it took to make the port, and the like. Having sown this seed I visited the magazine office when it was empty, and studied the wall-maps as if wishing to refresh my recollection. Finishing there, I returned to the shore and talked with a fellow who owned a small vessel called a flute. I asked him if he ever made Pensacola in his little craft. In the background I saw the sergeant glaring at us.

I must have a boat to take me to Pontchartrain. It was necessary that I escape under cover of night, leaving Bienville to believe I was making for Pensacola. I had informed mademoiselle that I would call for her, or send for her; and I intended to keep my word. Aside from this there were the Choctaws, whom Bienville would set on my trail if it was not believed I had departed in a boat.

I stuck close to the shore, sprawling on the sand, with Suarez or one of his men always in the middle distance, keeping watch. Toward sunset Bienville came hurrying down to the boats and accosted me, saying:

"Monsieur Brampton, I'm off for the island. Another ship come in. It's a h—l of a case! A sick woman here—and she may have the plague—and no place to keep this new lot either here or out there. I go to see they are kept on the ship until I can arrange for them."

He paused, and I knew what he would say next, and I rubbed my head and stomach and groaned slightly.

"Touched by the sun? Are you ill?" he asked, not unkindly.

"Only a queer dizziness. Something of a pain in my vitals," I answered, making a face as some imaginary twinge of pain shot through me.

He bit his lip and hesitated, his brows perplexed. His intention of compelling my company was being replaced by another safeguard. He expressed his regret, turned toward Suarez and beckoned him to approach, at the same time walking to meet him. He spoke briefly to the sergeant, then hastened down to the shore and went aboard a sailing vessel.

Suarez walked to me and with a smirk said:

"His excellency's compliments to Monsier Brampton, who is indisposed. Monsieur is advised to go to his excellency's quarters, take a stiff drink of brandy and lie down."

I rose and with unsteady steps walked with him toward the fort. As we advanced the fellow took more time to study my features—now screwed up in an expression of pain. His aplomb deserted him and he walked farther apart from me. He had no desire to catch the fever, and the moment I entered the living-room of the governor's house he hurriedly left me. I watched him give orders to two soldiers, who left the gate and took up positions closer to the house. They were reluctant to do this, as they had been enjoying the badinage of the women. Now I was confined and under guard. It must be this night or not at all.

I watched and waited while the night more snugly tucked its dark robes about the settlement. At last the monotony of the women's witticisms, screamed at the soldiers lounging at the gate, was varied by the sound of angry voices. At first I thought the men were quarreling, but after a bit it was plain they were complaining against some injustice.

"Messieurs, I thank you." Now I recognized the speaker as old Jules Mattor. His voice croaked with resentment. "His excellency is a just man, a good man. But these women in the bark-houses? They have no fever. Bah! I have lived here long enough and have seen enough of them die to know the fever."

"You waste your breath," growled a heavy voice. "The women stay here until his excellency returns. Then you can talk to him. You make my ears ache. If you go near the women's quarters you'll run into a musket ball weighing eight hundred grains. It will be bad for your digestion."

I slipped into the doorway with a robe over my shoulders. My scheme of escape was now stretching forth its tentacles like a devilfish and seeking to embrace the Mattors among its requirements.

"Is Jules Mattor there? Do I hear Jules Mattor's voice?" I called out. "This is Monsieur Brampton. I have a chill. Have you had the fever? Would it be dangerous for you to come nearer so I may question you?"

"There is no danger. I laugh at the fever, monsieur," he cried, glad to escape from the gibes of the soldiers; and he ran toward me through the dusk, closely followed by Basile.

"And your son? Has he had it?"

"Also the boy," he replied, halting before me. "Permit me to place my hand on monsieur's head."

"Say you are not sure. I have money for you. Hard money!" I whispered.

As quick as a weasel he was babbling:

"It is hard to tell, monsieur. In a short time, yes. For a certainty."

"I ate fish last evening. It may be that," I hopefully suggested, giving his hand a squeeze.

"Ah, those fish! Who knows? Then again it may be the fever."

Of course the hero has no fever. But will this scheme work?

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Cause for Rejoicing

That optimists see only the cheerful side of events because it is their nature to do so, and not because they are the beneficiaries of constant good fortune, was illustrated by a mishap that befell a man noted for his buoyant spirits. A friend, calling at his office, found him laughing heartily. At his feet lay the fragments of a mirror, which he explained, he had just broken accidentally. "But why are you so merry about it?" the friend inquired. "Why don't you see," laughed the optimist; "it limits my bad luck to seven years."

LEGION'S NATIONAL AVIATION PROGRAM

Suggestions for a national aviation program are being laid before the nation by the American Legion These suggestions are in the form of detailed proposals for a proper development of American aviation in all its phases.

The plan was officially put before the nation by the national executive committee of the Legion It was worked out by Reed G Landis of Chicago, chairman of the Legion's National aeronautics committee

When the plan was adopted, the committee adopted a resolution reaffirming its Omaha declaration that the organization is impressed with the proposal for a single department of national defense under one civilian secretary, with assistant secretaries for land, sea and air forces.

Reports of President Coolidge's air board, of the American aviation mission, of the government efficiency board and of the Lampert committee on aeronautics in the house of representatives were carefully studied by Mr. Landis in preparing his plan He also held conferences with military authorities of both the War and the Navy departments.

For military aviation the Legion program is:

(a) Substantial expenditure each year for modern flying equipment

(b) Survey and destruction of obsolete equipment.

(c) Promulgation of regulations on rank, pay and duty to fit specialized work.

(d) Appropriations sufficient to provide adequate equipment and training for the reserves and the National Guard.

Encouragement of civilian and commercial aviation, apart from military aviation was recommended. Means suggested to this end were:

(a) Establishment of a bureau of aeronautics in the Department of Commerce

(b) Extension of the air mail, preferably by contract

(3) Construction of lighted airways and dissemination of proper weather information

(d) Release of a reasonable amount of surplus aviation equipment to civilians at fair prices.

(e) Program of education and commercial encouragement prepared and executed by the bureau of aeronautics.

Means recommended for the encouragement of the aircraft industry were:

(a) Cessation of government competition.

(b) Instituting a program of continuous production

(c) Protection of rights of design.

System Does It

Brown walked into a restaurant, picked out a certain table and sat down. Before he had time to open his paper a waiter placed a meal before him.

"How in the name of everything do you get such service?" asked a friend, who had been watching. "Do you own the place?"

"Oh, no," replied Brown modestly "It's a little system I'm trying. The last time I was in town I came in here and gave my order. This is it."—The American Legion Weekly.

Novel Membership Campaign

In the heart of Miami, Fla., members of the American Legion constructed a realistic dugout during a membership drive. The dugout, constructed of sand bags, was an exact reproduction of shelters used by American troops on the front in France. It was used as headquarters of the campaign.

Approximately two hundred American Legion posts were awarded Distinguished Service citations by national headquarters for having surpassed their 1925 membership for 1926 before the first day of December, 1925

MARCH 31 DATE TO OPEN 'WET' HEARING

Senators and Private Citizens Will Be Allowed to Express Views.

Washington.—With Representative Hill (Rep., Md) unanimously re-elected chairman, the unofficial house committee for modification of the Volstead act will hold its open special hearings on March 31 preliminary to drafting a bill to revise the prohibition law.

The modificationists have instructed Mr Hill, who has led them in congress for some years, to appoint a "temperance board" of five to consider questions on that subject and to outline a program for the committee. At the hearings all members of congress and private citizens will be given opportunity to express their views regarding modification. The committee hopes then to be able to whip these opinions and suggestions into a bill for presentation in the house.

The subject of prohibition not only was brought up in the house a few days ago but it entered the records of the Supreme court, where John W. Davis and Assistant Attorney General Willebrandt debated a legal question arising from the provision of the law under which permits to sell distilled spirits are issued.

Wayne B. Wheeler, general counsel for the Anti-Saloon league, added a statement to the discussion, declaring the suggestion of Senator Edwards (Dem., N J.) for a national referendum on prohibition to be illegal and impracticable

The Anti-Saloon league, in turn, was attacked again as a "hypocritical, unlawful, un-American pest," by Representative Britten (Rep., Ill.), who in a statement said he had been assured by Chairman Snell of the house rules committee that any prohibition investigation undertaken at this session undoubtedly would include the activities of the league.

On the house floor, Representative Tinkham (Rep., Mass.) declared churches and other religious bodies were seeking political power by assisting propaganda for "sumptuary prohibition laws." His speech was not without interruptions from the dry forces, but these were met by counter taunts that the wets were not given a chance to present a case

Church organizations, Mr. Tinkham said, had "filled the corridors of the capitol with their paid professional agents, have directed judicial appointments and are attempting to dictate international, domestic and economic policies."

"Jinx" Ship of Dry Navy Is Now Beyond Salvage

New London, Conn.—The "jinx" ship of the government's patrol, the bugaboo of the coast guard service, the vessel shunned by men of the service—the 75-foot patrol boat 126—has passed out of the maritime picture.

The vessel from which at least one man lost his life and aboard which many seamen narrowly escaped death and injury and eight of whose crew are now awaiting trial in New York on serious charges, will capture no more rum runners, will carry no more illicit liquor and confront no more guardsmen as a craft of ill fortune and disaster.

The 126, wrecked on the rocks of Narragansett bay shore in the blizzard of February 10, has broken up and slipped into water from which it will yield no salvage.

Western Roads Plan Wage Increase Fight

Chicago.—After a conference here, Western railroad executives have selected a committee of twelve to represent the roads in the deliberations regarding wages to be held with conductors and trainmen.

No date has yet been set for these deliberations, but the managers have already put themselves on record as opposing the demands for a 7 per cent pay increase.

About eighty railroads, with a trackage of approximately 135,000 miles, were represented at the conference. W. M. Jeffers, general manager of the Union Pacific road, was made chairman of the wage committee, and W. F. Thiehoff, general manager of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, vice chairman.

$106,000 Bull Runs Amuck on Farm; Has to Be Shot

Genesee, N. Y.—Carnation King Pontiac, son of the famous bull Carnation King Sylvia, for which the Carnation stock farms of Seattle, Wash., paid $106,000, is no more. King Pontiac, weighing 2,300 pounds, went amuck and charged an attendant at the E. E. Doty farm here. The attendant fled and the bull turned on a load of hay, scattering it about the highway. Officer James Moffatt of the local police force, a noted rifle shot, ended the bull's life.

OBITUARY OF GERALD ALVIN SCHLAWIN

O God who is like unto thee! Thou which hast showed me great and sore troubles, shall quicken me again, and shall bring me up again from the depths of the earth. For His anger endureth but a moment, in His favor is life: weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.

It has pleased God in His wisdom to call Gerald Alvin Schlawin, son of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Schlawin from this life into that which is to come

Gerald was born the 29th of October, 1917, was baptized January 13, 1918 in the Christian faith and received such religious instruction, at home and Sunday School, as is possible for a child of that age.

About New Years he became sick with the influenza; he seemed to have recovered fairly well from this treacherous malady, but about four weeks ago it developed that he had diabetes and in a very severe form. The best of attention was given him, competent physicians were consulted, but to no avail. It soon proved that all human help for recovery was in vain. God had ordained different.

The Lord relieved him of his suffering Monday afternoon at 4:00 o'clock, March 8, 1926.

Three children of this family have preceded him in death, a boy and a girl, the two oldest in the family, in infancy another sister, Meta in 1915 at the age of 9 years.

He leaves to mourn his early death, his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Schlawin, his grandparents, Mrs. A. Schlawin and Mr. and Mrs. Henry Wille, two brothers Verner and Arthur, as well as many relatives and friends.

May the Lord bless and comfort you in your bereavement and let us say with the Apostle Paul: For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and wether we die we die unto the Lord, whether we live therefore or die we are the Lord's.

The funeral was held from the Reformed Church, Thursday, March 11, and burial was made in the family lot at the Klemme Cemetery.

(Rev C. A. Schmid.)

Card Of Thanks

We wish to thank our many friends and neighbors for the kindness and sympathy shown us in our sorrow when death called our little son Gerald. We also wish to thank those who contributed the beautiful floral offering in memory of our beloved son.

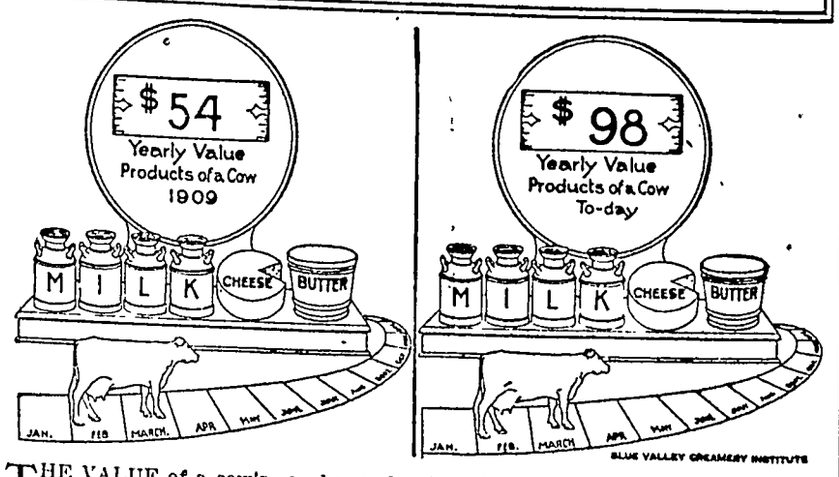
HIGH SCHOOL ORCHESTRA WILL GIVE CONCERT

School Orchestra Under Direction Of Gary Has Been Working Hard

The date for the Klemme High School Orchestra Concert has been set for Friday, April 2nd. The Orchestra has been working hard for the past three months to give the people of Klemme a worth while program, and feel that they deserve the support of the comunity at their concert. The rehearsals have been very satisfactory in the past few weeks, and the Orchestra feels that the concert will be all that could be expected of a high school group. We know that the people of Klemme are behind the school in athletics. Let's see if they cannot back other school activities, which are surely as worthy, equally as well. Give the Orchestra a boost with your presence and that of your friends and show them that you appreciate their efforts. You will not be disappointed.

The money is used to pay for music, and what is left over will go to help pay for the new stage scenery.

Value of Cow's Yearly Work Shows Gain of 81 Per Cent



THE VALUE of a cow's yearly production of dairy products in 1909 was $54. Today it is $98, an increase in 15 years of 81 per cent, according to the Blue Valley Creamery Institute. During the same period, however, total milk production increased 51 per cent, the number of dairy cows 19 per cent and the purchasing power of their products 17 per cent. The average amount of milk produced by each cow increased from 3,434 pounds in 1909 to 4,368 at present, or 27 per cent, which shows that the average production of milk gained with the larger numbers of cows and that both increased at a greater rate than the purchasing power of each cow's production. In other words, the institute points out, the value of each cow's production has not kept pace with the value of commodities the farmer must buy. As cows producing 4,368 pounds of milk a year are low-profit makers, the importance of high-producing animals is emphasized by the institute's experts. Better breeding, better feeding and the elimination of low-producing cows will make more profitable dairy herds and increase the value and purchasing power of each cow's products, the Institute concludes.

Steck Held To Be Senator Over Brookhart In Recount

HAS LEAD OF 1,420 VOTES ON BASIS OF INTENTION

And Actual Plurality Is Is 76, Says Report On Contest

WASHINGTON, March 16.—The senate elections committee today faced the question of accepting or rejecting the report of its sub-committee recommending the unseating of Senator Brookhart, republican, Iowa, in favor of his democratic opponent, Daniel F. Steck.

At an executive session late yesterday the sub-committee reported that it had concluded that Steck had received a majority of the votes and should be seated. The sub-committee was unanimous in its conclusions but Senator George, democrat, Georgia, dissented from some of the grounds on which the findings were based.

1,420 Plurality For Steck

The committee held that if in counting the ballots the rule was followed whereby the intent of the voter was the guiding factor, Steck had a plurality of 1,420 votes over Brookhart, and that even if the intent of the voter was disregarded, Steck would have a plurality of 76 votes on a straight out count.

Senator Brookhart announced that he will contest the case to its end and he believes he will have asubstantial majority of the entire committee on which to base his fight on the floor of the senate.

Highlights Of The Case

Contesting for the seat of the Junior Senator from Iowa, in the United States senate, Smith W. Brookhart and Daniel F. Steck, his democratic opponent, waged one of the most complicated and technical disputes ever heard by that body in all history.

Threats of a contest for the senatorship seat were carried into execution after the Iowa official count credited Brookhart with 447,594 votes and Steck with 446,840 establishing the re-election of Brookhart. The contest was filed by Steck.

The statement filed Jan. 7, 1925, alleged there were many irregularities in the election and declared that if count were correct Steck would lead by 5,000 votes. Twelve charges were set out.

During the summer seventy-five people worked in the nation's capital counting the ballots. Unofficial estimates of the cost of the contest ran as high as $300,000. This must be paid by the government. Also, if Brookhart is unseated he still would be paid the salary of his office for the beginning of the term, while Steck also would receive a senator's salary from March 4.

But Steck continues his job as attorney and does not get excited about it. He says, 'I'm not seated yet."

A UNIVESSAL LANGUAGE COULD BE EASILY LEARNED

IOWA CITY, March 18.—A soothing syrup which could be a factor in the ironing out of international differences is Esperanto, a universal language, declared Prof. Pierre Bovet of Switzerland, who has just concluded a visit at the university.

French and English have since the World War come the nearest to being universal languages, but in the opinion of Professor Bovet, to establish the language of one people over the world would be an unfair advantage to that people, would impoverish thought and research by destroying the other languages, and would not be accepted by other countries. Esperanto would put all peoples on an equal basis and no embarassment would be felt in speaking it, he stated. It took Professor Bovet only three days to learn Esperanto.

The states of New York and Massachustetts are quarreling about who owns the land at the bottom of Lake Ontario. Let Florida have it and it will be laid out in building lots inside of three weeks.

1000 Community Meetings Each Month

Community meetings are more typically American than anything else in America today, says W. H. Stacy of the Extension Service, Iowa State College.

The rural township and community meetings have developed in all parts of Iowa until there are now 1,000 meetings of this kind held each month. Mr. Stacy says that the entertaining features of these meetings are being developed in a variety of ways. Fifty-two township farm bureaus now have their own orchestras, 247 put on home talent plays, 62 develop mock trials and more than 100 had debates during 1925.

CREAMERY TO ENLARGE AND REBUILD REFIGERATOR

New Refrigerator Wil Be Lined All Around With Four Inches Of Cork

The Klemme Creamery are about to further bebuild and enlarge part of their plant when the present refrigerating and storage room will be enlarged and improved.

The storage room is now only lined with one inch of insulating material, but the improved room will be lined with four inches of cork insulation, side walls, ceiling and floor, which should easily hold the low temperature required.

The refrigerating room wil also be enlarged and when completed will be 8x16 feet in size. A new door will be installed of standard type, and besides this there will be a small door cut in so that print butter can be taken out of the refrigerator without opening the large door or entering the room. A loading door will be cut in also for easily handling the tub butter from the refrigerator.

METHODIST CHURCH NOTES

A. W. Gaugor, Pastor

The pastor was unexpectedly called away last week to atenn a funeral and so was unable tof fill his pulpit last Sunday. Very favorable reports come to us concerning the meeting in Klemme, and we take this means of expressing our gratitude to Prof. Penrod for the helpful address that he gave as well as to others who helped along musical lines. And, not to overlook those who helped to make the meeting a success by their presence.

A special speaker is socured for next Sunday morning in both the churches. This meeting is given over to the W. F. M. S. interests and is considered one of the outstanding meetings of the year. The speaker comes direct from the mission fields and has a burning message for all. A full house is assured, as all interested in the better things of life will be there. The meeting will be featured by the annual Thankoffering collection.

FEEDING BABY CHICKS IS BIG PROBLEM

It Requires Close Attention and Adequate Information

No phase of poultry work requires closer attention or more information than that of feeding baby chicks says H. A. Bittenbender, head of th Poultry Husbandry Department o Iowa State College.

For the first 60 to 72 hours of the chicks' life, Mr. Bittenbender recommends that they receive no feed at all. The feed for the first three times should consist of 8 parts of rolled oats and 1 part of hard boiled eggs. After this, until the chicks have reached about 6 weeks of age, their ration can be made up of cracked corn, rolled oats and whole wheat in equal parts.

After the sixth week the ration can be composed of 66 parts of cracked corn to 34 of whole wheat. During this time it is well to keep a mash before them composed of 25 parts of middlings, 25 parts of corn meal, 25 parts of oat flour, 10 parts of dried buttermilk, 4 pounds of ground lime stone, 2 pounds of bone meal, 2 lbs. of charcoal and 1 pound of salt.

Mr. Bittenbender recommends that one person do all the feeding of the chicks, which will lessen the liability of neglect or misunderstanding and the chicks will receive more uniform care.

One glance at the styles of today proves that the female of the species is more hardy than the male.

DRYS PLAN WAR TO STEM WET ADVANCE

Counter-Offensive Started to Check Demand for Change in Present Law.

Washington.—Goaded into action by fear that prohibition is losing favor, dry leaders in and out of congress have determined to start a counter-offensive to stem the rising tide of sentiment for modification of the Volstead act.

While drys publicly denounce the poll being taken by newspapers, revealing an overwhelming majority of the votes cast in favor of beer and wine, they admit privately that the poll has convinced them that they must bestir themselves or the prohibition cause will lose ground rapidly.

Senator McKellar of Tennessee, a teetotaler and one of the most enthusiastic prohibitionists in the senate, has been selected to begin the dry drive.

In order to stop criticism by wets of the laxity of enforcement, it is understood Anti-Saloon league leaders hope to win support from the President for more drastic legislation.

Although Senator Cummins of Iowa, chairman of the senate judiciary committee, announced appointment of a subcommittee to consider the various bills for repeal or modification of the Volstead law, the question of open hearings will be determined by the full committee after the small body reports.

The subcommittee consists of Senators Means, Colorado, chairman; Goff, West Virginia; Harreld, Oklahoma; Reed, Missouri, and Walsh of Montana. All but Reed are counted as drys.

In the house dry leaders held a council of war and determined to defer as long as possible hearings before the house committee on alcoholic liquor traffic to survey the results of prohibition.

Representative Oliver of New York offered a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment providing "a state law consistent with the Constitution shall be the supreme law within the boundaries of the state, the Volstead act notwithstanding."

In an accompanying statement, Oliver declared congress has usurped the field of enforcement, under a Supreme court decision, and reduced states to mere enforcement agencies of the national government. He added:

"The rebellion of the people against the Volstead law is so widespread that the time is here for the restoration of state authority."

Mob Kills Three in Mexican Church Riot

Nayarit, Mexico.—Three representatives of the State of Nayarit were killed and a number of persons injured, one girl probably fatally, in a riot resulting from orders to close a Catholic church at Jalisquello, a neighboring town. The officials met armed opposition from church followers.

A Catholic priest at Jalisquello had failed to comply with the closing law and was standing his ground against Presidential orders, with the backing of his flock.

Representatives of the government at Jalisquello were met by an infuriated mob, which demanded their withdrawal.

Undaunted by the mob confronting them, which was armed with all sorts of weapons, the three men faced the gathering and read the authorization of the government's closing of the church. Soldiers in sufficient numbers to protect the dignitaries were not available.

SUES TO DISSOLVE SIXTEEN PATENTS

U. S. Seeks to Revoke Texas Company's Claim.

New York.—Cancellation of the so-called Adams patents, basic patents of the "cracking process" by which hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of gasoline is refined from crude oil every year, has been asked by Attorney General Sargent.

Charging that the 16 patents, now valued at from $40,000,000 to $70,000,000 and owned by the Texas company, one of the largest oil concerns in the country, were obtained by fraud, the Department of Justice filed suit in Federal court in Brooklyn.

The suit will have far-reaching effect on the oil industry and its success, if attained, will result in cheaper gasoline for the public, it is declared.

The defendants are:

The Texas company, which owns the patents and in turn leases them to more than 40 oil companies in this country.

Joseph H. Adams of Flatbush, Brooklyn, who originally filed claims for the patents which are the subject of the suit.

The patents were obtained "by fraud, collusion, false suggestion and concealment on the part of Adams and the Texas company," the government charged.

The action constitutes the largest single patent suit ever instituted.

Loss of the Adams patents and the processes developed from them will cost the Texas company nearly $10,000,000 in loss of income annually, the government believes.

Forest Week April 18-24 Designated by Coolidge

Washington.—The week of April 18-24 is designated American Forest week in a proclamation by President Coolidge.

The Canadian government has set apart the same week for the same purpose, and this, President Coolidge declared in the proclamation, "is an added reason why our citizens should give careful thought to a matter so important to both countries."

Although warning that "too long have we as a nation consumed our forest wealth without adequate provision for its wise utilization and renewal," the President noted that a "gratifying change is taking place in the attitude of our industries, our landowners, and the American people toward our forests."

"The wise use of land," he continued, "is one of the main foundations of sound national economy. It is the cornerstone of national thrift. The waste or misuse of natural resources cuts away the groundwork on which national prosperity is built."

Local forest week committees are being formed in every state under the direction of a committee of nearly 100 groups, under the chairmanship of former Gov. Frank O. Lowden of Illinois.

ILLINOIS POISONER MAKES CONFESSION

Sentenced to Life Imprisonment, Woman Tells of Two Other Murders.

Flora, Ill.—Mrs. Elsie Bible Malinsky, forty-four, under life sentence for the murder by poison of the former wife of her third husband, has substantially admitted having committed two other poison murders and attempted a fourth, State's Attorney Harold S. Williams announced.

Her other victims, the state's attorney related, were a husband and the former wife of a former husband.

The woman's confession came on the eve of her departure for Joliet prison.

Authorities said she broke down under the weight of strong circumstantial evidence, but did not make a complete confession to the crimes.

The information made public by Williams, which, he said, is practically the substance of the confession, is that about 15 years ago she killed with poison the wife of Hawill Bible in order that she might marry him, and that about three years ago she fatally poisoned Bible when she became dissatisfied with him as a husband.

Her first husband, Wilbur Cope, divorced her about 18 years ago after it was alleged, she had made an unsuccessful attempt to poison him, the state's attorney said. Later she was convicted of living in adultery with Bible.

According to Williams and her alleged confession, she poisoned Bible's first wife and then married him. His death occurred in December, 1923, but was not investigated at the time.

The woman became housekeeper for Ernest L. Malinsky, her present husband, and gave poison to his wife causing her death last September 26. She then married Malinsky and her arrest recently followed exhuming of the body of the first Mrs. Malinsky and a chemical examination of the viscera.

Malinsky is held in the murder of his first wife, but the poison murderess has absolved him of blame. No new charges are to be filed against her.

Indiana Court Asked to Punish Dry League Head

Indianapolis.—A formal petition asking that the Indiana Supreme court cite Edward S. Shumaker, superintendent of the Indiana Anti-Saloon league, and Ethan A. Miles and Jess E. Martin, attorneys for the league, to appear and show why they should not be punished for contempt of court was filed here by Arthur L. Gilliom, attorney general.

The action of the attorney general is based on statements made in Shumaker's annual report concerning the Indiana Supreme court.

"The statements are false and contemptuous of the court," Gilliom's petition asserts.

Would Impeach Judge of U. S. District Court

Washington.—By a vote of 15 to 6, the house committee on judiciary approved a resolution recommending the impeachment of United States Judge George W. English of the Eastern district of Illinois. The resolution was as follows:

If the house approves impeachment it will mean the trial of Judge English before the senate. The votes of two-thirds of the members of the senate will be necessary to convict.

Charges against Judge English come under three general heads, corruption, judicial tyranny, and indecent conduct on the bench.

DAMOAN THE FOX

SYNOPSIS.—Traveling by canoe on the Mississippi, on his way to Biloxi, in the early days of the settlement of Louisiana, William Brampton, English spy, known to Indians and settlers as the "White Indian," sees a Natchez Indian post a declaration of war against the French. For his own purposes, he hastens to Biloxi to carry the news to Bienville, French governor Brampton meets an old friend, Joe Labrador, Indian halfbreed, who warns him Bienville has threatened to hang him as a spy. Brampton refuses to turn back. He falls in with Jules and Basile Mattor, on their way to Biloxi to secure wives from a ship, the Maire, bringing women from France. At Biloxi Brampton protects a woman from a sergeant's brutality. She tells him she is Claire Dahlsgaarde, picked up in a raid in Paris. Evidently well bred and educated, she is a mystery to Brampton. He intervenes to prevent a man, English, known as "Old Six Fingers," following her to New Orleans. A Frenchman, Francois Narbonne, slightly demented by stories he has heard of the riches of the New World, introduces himself. Bienville accuses Brampton of treachery, but the latter secures a respite from death by revealing the Natchez declaration of war. He is to await the arrival of a former companion, Damoan the Fox, who will exonerate or condemn him. Damoan has documents proving Brampton an English spy. Brampton receives a message from Claire begging him to help her reach the English settlements. Brampton trusts Narbonne with a note to Claire promising to meet her at New Orleans. He plans his escape.

The conversation at the gate was being resumed. The shrill voices of the women were being answered with broad retorts. To Jules I murmured: "I must be at Pascagoula bay some-time tomorrow—"

"H—ll It must be the fever stew-ing your brains, monsieur!"

"Softly, you fool! Here are five pis-toles in my hand. Feel of them. They are for you if you do as I say."

"Five pistoles! Permit me to be assured by touching them! Nom de Dieu! It is true."

"Then you will take them and help me!"

"God pity poor fishermen! We do not dare. Blood for blood!" And he shuddered.

"I will try the hot drink and the sweat." Then under my breath: "Who is to know? You have been refused women. You go aboard your packet and start for Pontchartrain. When around the island you turn and make for Pascagoula bay."

"But monsieur will be seen enter-ing my boat and leaving with us. Else the dog of a sergeant will shoot us down before we can raise the sail," mum-bled Mattor, his fingers jerking con-vulsively as they touched the pistoles.

"I shall not go with you. You will enter your boat alone.

"You are free to go when and where you will. They will see you start back for Lake Pontchartrain. When out of sight you will go to Pascagoula. You will carry these five pistoles with you."

"Ah le bon Dieu!"

"And you will fish in the bay until sunset tomorrow, waiting for me to come overland and join you. You will watch for my smoke on the shore and come in close. I will hold both arms high above my head. I will steal a canoe or swim for it. If you see my smoke but do not see me you will know you can wait until dark before risking me off, thus avoiding any risk of being seen helping me."

"Then to Pensacola!" whispered Mattor. "My soul is frightened. An eye for an eye, says his—"

"Then you will receive ten more pistoles."

"Plunge me into hell if that much money is to be found there!" he cried.

"Good! I will take this risk. We will go to Pensacola with you. Monsieur will bring the rest of the money?"

"I have it with me now. Remember your sailing directions; make for the west, then double back and go to rest in Pascagoula bay. Watch for me to come before sundown."

"Mais oui! And if you do not come before sundown?"

"Then sail back here with your fish and keep the money."

"Monsieur has won my heart. I care for my son as for myself. I tell you again, monsieur, it is not for me that if you have fever, or are sick from eating poisoned fish. It is no use to talk about it. You are better off in the sea. We must go. They refuse the sweet company of women. Imagine a house filled with women, and they refuse one for Jules Mattor, pioneer for France—"

"And one for Basile Mattor, his father's brave son," interpolated the youth.

"No more of that talk, you old devil. You and your worthless son must leave the fort. Remember, if you are seen near the women's houses you will get a brace of musket balls," broke in Sergeant Suarez' voice; and I realized the Mattors were cunning as foxes and had sensed his silent approach and had shifted the conversation to blind him.

"Sacre!" hissed Jules, turning and stamping to the gate.

Mumbling and grumbling, father and son gained the shore. For some time after they had vanished from sight I caught fragments of their oaths, and their solemn vows never to enter the gulf again.

Extinguishing the candle I threw myself on my robes in the corner and waited. Outside the soldiers chatted lazily, and speaking with much free-dom now that the governor was not present to overhear.

Gradually those not on guard sur-rendered to the claims of sleep and went to the barracks. I crawled to the window and peered out. The torch at the gate was extinguished. Within a rod of my window was the figure of a man. Near the door was another. As they occasionally moved about I heard the rattle of their ac-coutrements, and knew that despite my claim of being ill the sergeant had posted guards. I was wondering if the back of the house was also under surveillance when a new note caused the two men outside to steal toward each other, whispering excitedly. A woman had laughed outside the gate.

"She has left the house, Gaston," chuckled the fellow nearest my win-dow.

"Morbleu! They have all left the house! Hear the magpies! What fools! Suarez will be hearing them. Take a look at monsieur through the window while I run down to quiet them."

I stole back to my corner and threw myself on my robes and began an ex-cellent imitation of a man muttering in his sleep, or while slightly delirious. As I mumbled and tossed about I could discern a vague shape at the window and knew the fellow was lis-tening greedily. He withdrew, and I crossed the room. His mate was back from quieting the women, and I was in time to hear the sentinel say:

"Fever or fish, the devil has him in a black spell. He needs a guard no more than a dead Natchez. Come on!"

The two stole toward the gate to-gether. There was some muffled laughter and a guard's sibilant warn-ing for prudence, then the telltale sounds grew fainter and I knew they had withdrawn from the gate. Here was my chance to escape from the fort and make for the rendezvous at Pascagoula bay. I leaned from the window and listened for further sounds, then ducked back as a figure stole through the gate. Cursing the sentinel for not staying with his mates, I hastily withdrew to my robes and threw myself down.

I loosened a pistol and lay on my back and through half-closed lids gazed toward the door. The room suddenly became illumined as the heavy door, with scarcely a sound, swung open.

A lighted candle was advancing over the threshold. I closed my lids to mere slits. With soft padding steps a man swept across the room and seated himself at the table. I heard him sigh deeply, as if contented. I turned my head ever so little until my gaze rested on his moccasins. They were of Shawano make. His leggings, I next observed, were much travel-stained. I increased the field of vision until I was staring at the fringed skirts of his hunting shirt, then the sleeves, much worn; and the long brown hands idly resting on the table.

My heart tightened as I watched the hands and noticed their peculiar trick of interlocking the fingers and pulling them apart. I was face to face with fate. The coming of Bienville was all that was needed to complete the situa-tion. I was gazing on the sardonic profile of Damoan the Fox.

CHAPTER V

The False Trail.

He shifted his position so as almost to face me, and, supposing I was about to be discovered, I began drawing a pistol. He had seen nothing in my dark corner, however, and was merely uneasy.

He twisted nervously in his chair and darted his keen gaze about the room, taking time with the window and closed door. Next he drew from his belt his cassetete a pique, or iron tomahawk, and threw it on the table with a bang. It had interfered with his comfort. Then he slumped back and folded his arms and became mo-tionless as an Indian in ambush.

As I watched for an opportunity to take him unawares he suddenly leaped to his feet and snatching up the ax and candle glided to the door opening into his excellency's sleeping room and threw it open and peered inside. Obviously his woods instinct was urg-ing him to be on guard, and he was puzzled that the warning should be so strong and insistent here in the home of the governor. He walked back to the table slowly, his dark face drawn into ferocious lines, and clattered the ax on the board, and repeated his trick of continually darting side glances—a trick learned in the forest, when any tree might conceal a foe. His attitude proved he was conscious of being watched and that the affair must soon come to a head.

He was now standing with his back to me, and I came to my feet noise-lessly and stole to the table. I think it must have been some tremor in the puncheon floor that warned him he was no longer alone; for he faced about, his hand at his belt where his ax had hung.

For half a minute we stood there, staring at each other; I with my fin-gers resting on the table and touching the handle of the French ax, and he with one hand clutching the empty ax-loop. I will always give him credit for being a most consummate actor. As if he had just recognized me he came forward, both slim dark hands outstretched, and his mellow voice joy-ously crying:

"My friend! My friend! Ah, what good luck! My old comrade here in Biloxi. But my medicine is strong!"

My empty hands met his, and we stood there, smiling into each other's faces.

"Damoan! How anxiously I have waited for your coming. I was asleep in the corner," I cried.

"And how much swifter I would have come had I known you were here!" he fondly replied. "I reached the gate. The soldiers were at one side, too busy with some women to see me. I come here and find a candle, and enter. I feel the spirit of my friend. Then, behold! Like some ap-parition you are standing behind me!"

My eyes were staring at the right breast of his hunting shirt, where a slight bulge suggested a packet of pa-pers. The forced cordiality of his black eyes could not be sustained. Deep in the depths of his gaze twin-kled murderous little devils. There was something in my tense staring that caused his gaze to drop, to see if his hunting shirt was open. And I sensed a slight tightening of his iron-like fingers, and I increased my own pressure. I was the heavier, but he possessed a panther's quickness which I never saw equaled in any man. With a scream of rage he threw aside all pretense and attempted to jerk me to my knees. I tore my left hand free and smeared his cap down over his mouth, at the same time thrusting my foot behind his heel and hurling him back across the table. Butting my head into his chest, I got the neck of his shirt between my teeth and tore it open. Then he knew what I was after, and seized my left wrist and wrenched it clear of his face. Down went my head again, this time hitting him un-der the chin and driving his jaws to-gether with a snap, and my fumbling lips found the papers and my teeth closed upon them.

With a muffled howl of rage, he re-leased my wrist and snatched for the papers and took away a handful of my beard instead. His hand followed as I jerked up my head, but now I had him by the wrist. I straightened up a bit and dropped the papers on the floor and kicked them toward the win-dow. He twisted like a snake the in-stant the pressure was removed, and before I knew it he was face down on the table with his right hand clos-ing about the handle of the tomahawk. I fell on his back and stuffed the cap into his face and tried to catch his right hand and secure the ax.

Avoiding my clutching fingers, he swung the heavy ax up over his shoul-der in an attempt to brain me. I dug my head down into the hollow of his left shoulder and received the length of the ax-handle across my back, and secured his wrist.

From the gate came excited cries. "The Englishman is mad with the fever!" yelled a soldier.

Once more I sent the Fox against the table, this time knocking the can-dle to the floor. I stepped on it, plung-ing the room into darkness, and, wrenching the ax from him, struck where his head should have been. I hit him, but with the flat side only. Down he went into the upturned table. I dropped on all fours, and as my foot hit the papers I secured them and tucked them into my shirt. A streak of fire, and he had used one of his pistols. I leaped toward the window and hurled the ax in his direction. A snapping of wood told me the ax had smashed a table-leg or the chair. He fired his second pistol, but I was now against the wall, taking care not to pass before the window. I had located my musket and was making ready to fire when the door burst open.

"In here, you cowardly pigs!" yelled the sergeant's voice; and I heard him rush across the floor to where Damoan should be standing.

The sergeant grappled with him, thinking he was I, and a madman to boot, for there was a stamping and strangled outcry, and the Fox was screaming:

"Watch the window! Don't let the English spy escape!"

By this time several soldiers had crowded into the room, all shouting excitedly. As I leaped to the ground and ducked and dodged from side to side a gun crashed in the room behind me, and the clear voice of the Fox was raised in orders for the men to give chase. I reached the gate and there was no one there to oppose my going, which was well, for I passed through with the butt of my musket poised ready for a drive against the first head I could find.

When I crawled up the east slope of the ravine I could tell by the shout-ing that nearly all the soldiers were searching the shore expecting to find me trying to escape in some boat. Above their foolish confusion rose the mellow voice of the Fox, this time in a peculiar cry, a signal. It was an-swered from the forest north of the settlement by a long drawnout war-whoop, which I attributed to some Choc-taw. If Damoan had come to Biloxi with a band of Choctaw warriors, and could he set them on my trail, my flight might easily end in a tragedy.

I worked back from the shore to avoid the marsh and held my course through an intuitive sense of direc-tion. Even Damoan the Fox could not follow me through the night unless he could keep near enough to locate me by sound. Naturally I was startled when I heard a noise behind me which was never made by any woods crea-ture. It was as if some one had stepped on a wet root and had slipped, and all but fallen. Animals do not carry themselves in any such clumsy fashion. My careless tread instantly became cunning, the moccasin feeling out the ground before being allowed to rest. Several times I halted and lay in wait, but whoever was behind me held back.

Had it not been for Mademoiselle Dahlsgaarde I easily could have made Pensacola, and thence traveled north to Savannah. As it would be danger-ous to leave the grove until ready to make the Mattors' packet, I came to a halt and devoted my attention to cry-ing needs—to learn if the careless walker of the night was still on my track, and to find something to eat.

As I had the whole day before me, and as from the grove I could keep watch for Mattor's sail on the bay, I began looking about in hopes of find-ing some squirrels to knock over with my ax. Many a time in the wood I had remained motionless at the foot of a tree until squirrels and other small creatures mistook me for a stump and played and quarreled about my feet. I seated myself at the foot of an ancient oak to repeat the ruse. Fifteen or twenty minutes I had re-mained there, motionless; then some-thing as noiseless as a shadow passed by the opposite side of the tree. I began moving around the bole until behind the newcomer.

To my great relief it was an Indian, a Choctaw. He would be going to the Pascagoulas' village and would be sure to report any white man he saw. I might be gone before any French sol-diers came to look me up, and I might not. This thought sent me back to cover. I remembered that his corn-pouch seemed to be well-filled. Hun-ger won over discretion, and I stepped from behind the tree and called out to him—"Ale! Halloo."

He stared at me stolidly.

"The White Indian," he said.

I did not recognize him, although I scrutinized him sharply. There were always Indians, strangers to me, com-ing and going at the French posts, who would remember every white man they saw.

"I am the White Indian, and I am hungry," I said, approaching him. "I will buy your corn."

"It is very good. Melted bear's fat is poured over it," he said, promptly removing the pouch and handing to me.

Just one thing after another. What is this new peril?

Measuring in Tons

Two men were disputing as to the weight of an inch of rainfall. "I read somewhere that it is 101 tons of water to the acre," said one. "No," said the other, "I'm positive the correct figure is 113 tons." The weather bureau of the United States Department of Ag-riculture says that both are right. The rainfall in the first instance was reck-oned by the long ton, or 2,240 pounds, the common ton in Great Britain. The long ton is used for some purposes in this country, but the short ton of 2,-000 pounds, which gave the second re-sult, is more usual here.

SUCCESS IN AMERICA AN OPEN HIGHWAY

How Four Boys of Humble Origin Have Become Chiefs of the Greatest Financial Organization in the World.

Broad highways of achievement are wide open to all in America no matter how humble their beginning, it is brought out by a writer in Forbes Magazine, telling of the successive elevation of poor boys to the chieftainship of the most powerful association of financial power in the world.

"Nowhere is opportunity so democratic as in caste-free America, nowhere is recognition for faithful service so little conditioned by inherited position and wealth," the article says. "The bounty of America in bestowing her rewards of great success upon those of modest origin is again notably manifest in the rise of Oscar Wells to the presidency of the American Bankers Association.

"The son of a tanner, John H. Puelicher, was elected to this eminence in 1922. Circumstances ended his public schooling in the seventh year and he went to work in a carpet store in Milwaukee. At sixteen he entered a bank as a clerk, rising step by step until he became president. Recognition of his abilities as a banker and civic service through public education in sound economic understanding brought him the highest reward from his profession.

"A former country school teacher, Walter W. Head, born in a farm hamlet in Western Illinois, was elected president of the association in 1923. He gave up teaching and a salary of $75 to enter banking at $40 a month in a small Missouri town. He subsequently became president of a bank in Omaha, the largest in Nebraska and a dozen neighboring states. The position he occupied in advancing agricultural welfare during the period of depression led to his being called the 'Granger President of the American Bankers Association.'

"From Irish immigrant lad to supreme head of banking in America epitomizes the career of William E. Knox, president of one of the largest savings banks of the country in New York. His business career began as an office boy in a publishing house, and he later entered the bank as a clerk. Experience with humble people in their problems of personal finance and his inculcation of economy in all matters attracted country-wide attention.

"Oscar Wells, who rises in 1925 as successor of these men, was born in an old weather-boarded log cabin house in the Missouri River bottoms of Platte County, Missouri. He became an orphan when three years of age, losing his parents in an epidemic that ravaged the countryside. He passed under the care of an uncle, head of a small country bank in Platte City, a town of a few hundred inhabitants, growing up on a farm and receiving his early education in a rural school. He later entered Bethany College, West Virginia, but at the end of his junior year he had to quit college and go to work in the bank."

His subsequent career was one of steady progress, first to higher positions among small country banks, then to larger city banks in Texas, where he rose to the top. In 1914 he was chosen first governor of the Dallas Federal Reserve Bank and served through the opening period of the establishment of that institution. He resigned to become president of a bank in Birmingham, Alabama, which has grown under his administration to be one of the largest and most successful institutions in the South.

HUGE GROWTH IN SCHOOL SAVINGS

New York.—School savings in the United States for the year 1924-1925 increased in aggregate bank balances by $5,500,000, with a growth of 630,000 in the total number of pupils participating, it is shown in reports made to the American Bankers Association, which declares that the returns encourage belief in the permanence of school savings as a part of the educational program in the public schools.

During the year the number of reporting school savings systems increased from 683 in 742 districts to 760 in 1,557 districts, the number of schools from 9,080 to 10,163, the number of pupils participating from 2,236,326 to 2,869,497, the deposits from $14,991,535.40 to $16,961,560.72 and the bank balances from $20,435,144.64 to $25,913,431.15, says W. E. Albig, in charge of the Association's savings activities.

Since 1920, the first year for which comprehensive statistics are available, the number of schools having school savings banking has increased 271.4 per cent, the enrollment in school savings districts 278.9 per cent, participants 520.2 per cent, deposits 506.1 per cent and bank balances 516.8 per cent.

APPLY ORCHARD SPRAY SOON

March Or Early April Is Time To Fight Scale

Orchardists who have trees affected with oyster shell scale, San Jose scale and scurfy scale should plan on applying a lime sulphur spray in March or in early April, according to the spray calendar recently issued by the Extension Service of Iowa State College.

When trees badly infested with the scales are to be treated, a spray made up of 5 or 6 gallons of lime sulfur added to enough water to make 50 gallons should be used. When spraying for peach leaf curl or plum docket, it is necessary to use only 3 gallons of lime sulfur to 50 gallons of water.

The bark of the tree infested with San Jose scale is ash gray in color and when cut shows a reddish discoloration. In absence of treatment young trees are killed in two or three seasons, while older trees are greatly weakened and eventually die.

The oyster shell scale is recognizable by the resemblance of its scale to a long, narrow oyster shell. It has the same effect on trees as the San Jose scale. The scurfy scale is not so injurious as the other scales. It may be recognized by its light color, which gives the bark of the tree a spotted appearance.

Soils well supplied with lime are essential for heavy clover crops; heavy clover crops make possible heavy oat and corn crops which follow.

Grinding hay for dairy cows is something like owning pigs and doing your own squealing.

Spring must be close at hand. The baseball teams are training in the South and the Riff war has started once more.

EASTERN BUMS LIKED IOWA'S QUIETNESS SO STAY TO GET EDUCATED

"Three Musketoes" Are Honor Men At Iowa University

IOWA CITY, March 18.—Three University of Iowa students hoboed into an education. Boarding a train in New York City they found themselves thirty-eight hours later alone on the rolling prairies somewhere in the middle west.

Dirty, hungry, and disgusted, they followed the rails into a town and found situated there the University of Iowa. Within ten hours they had found work, and now they are making their own way through school and planning on making Phi Beta Kappa.

For six weeks before they took Horace Greeley's advice and went west they would meet every morning from twelve until two in a small New York restaurant and lay plans writing everything on paper. They called themselves the "Three Musketoes."

They say they like the west because it is "so quiet." Herbert "Kid" Greenhaus works in a clothing store, Benjamin "Shorty" Steinberg in the State Hospital, and Benjamin "Pickey" Abramowitz in the girls' dormitory.

DESIGNS PROCESS FOR TELLING TIME BY THE DOG STAR

Wylie's Scheme Based On Star's Relation To The Sun

IOWA CITY, March 18.—"When you run out of gas on a lonely road at night, when your watch has stopped, and the sky is overcast with a thin layer of clouds, you can determine the time of night by the brilliant dog star, Sirius, that shines through the clouds."

Many people have been able to approximate the time of day by the position of the sun, but it was left to Charles C. Wylie, head of the astronomy department at the University of Iowa, to develop this new method of telling time by the intensely white star, Sirius, that follows the path of the sun in the southern sky.

On New Year's eve the position of Sirius at any hour is the same as that of the winter sun at the same hour of the day, that is, it rises at 7 00, is on the meridian at 12: and sets at 5:00 Stars in their orbit gain two hours a month, so after finding Sirius, one must first estimate the hour at which the sun would be in the same position, then from that time subtract two hours for each month that has passed since January 1.

The accurate time of the country is determined by the U. S. Naval observatory at Washington after observing the stars on every clear night M. Wylie explained. With this time they check on the three high grade clorks kept in bell jars in an underground vault where the temperature is kept constant.

Sirius was worshipped hundreds of years ago by the ancients who called it the dog star. They thought it harbored a malignant spirit. Every year when it came close to the sun the days were hot and sultry so they called those days, dog days.

Although Sirius is the star closest to the earth, it is so far away that it takes eight years for its light to reach the earth. At that, the light rays travel so fast that they go once and a half around the earth between two ticks of a watch.

Right next to the dog star is a very little star called the pup. At the Mount Wilson observatory near Pasadena, Calif., which is the most complete in the world, experiments have been made which prove the little star to be the heaviest of matter which man has yet found. A piece of it as big as a half dollar would weigh as much as the ordinary man.

NEW DIAMOND MINES PROLIFIC IN STONES

Are Believed to Be Richest in World.

The world has several times been threatened with a diamond famine. Nearly a century ago experts calculated that the diamond supply was rapidly decreasing and could not long be expected to meet the demand. The discovery of the South African mines solved this problem for a long period. A generation ago much was written about the rapid growth of the demand for diamonds, especially in America, and the probability of a serious diamond shortage if new sources of supply were not soon discovered. Likelihood of a diamond shortage for some time to come has been removed by the discovery of diamonds in the Belgian Congo. Although diamonds were first discovered in this region as late as 1907, the development of the industry has been remarkable. It is virtually a postwar industry. During 1023 and 1924 nearly 20 per cent of the world's supply of diamonds, measured by weight, was gathered in these mines.

It has been necessary in some places to cut away almost impenetrable jungle at great expense before mining operations could be commenced. In other regions the diamond deposits are covered by deep sand, clay and silt.

The new African mines are believed to be the largest in the world. It is estimated that the diamond-bearing earth is spread over 150,000 square miles. Since the region lies just south of the equator climatic conditions encountered are difficult. This region had rarely been penetrated until the discovery of diamonds. To reach it a river journey of some 500 miles is necessary from the nearest railroad.

The equipment of the mines is modern and up to date. A narrow-gauge railroad has been built and more than 1,000 miles of automobile roads constructed. Several powerful wireless stations are maintained by the diamond company to keep in touch with the outside world.

The quality of the diamonds mined varies widely. Many of the stones are blue-white or colorless and transparent, comparing favorably with those from other parts of the world. Many are yellow and brown, green, blue and red. There is a wide variation in size. Diamonds of 40 carats have been found and 10-carat stones are comparatively common. Many of the stones are found in the beds of streams where the action of the water has chipped them.

About fifty diamond mines are in operation in this general region. A single company now employs nearly 25,000 workmen. A force of a few hundred white men directs thousands of natives.

Convicted Through Dream

Re-acting in dream has led to the death sentence being pronounced on a Dusseldorf (Germany) laborer. The condemned man fired two revolver shots at his victim, and as the man was still living he killed him by beating him on the head. He then threw the body into the Rhine. The prisoner in March of last year was arrested for a petty offense and thrown into jail with another man. While asleep in his cell in the night his companion heard him say in a dream: "At first I discharged my revolver at him, but as the fool struggled to rise to his feet I knocked him down and stepped on his head. This time he was dead, and I picked him up and threw his body into the Rhine." The facts were reported by the second prisoner, and the following day Schramm was formally accused of the murder. The body of the dead man was recovered, and revealed that death was caused as described by the prisoner in his night vision.

England's Herring Haul

The end of October sees the East Anglian autumn herring season in full swing. East Anglia—especially the Yarmouth district—has been a herring center for close on 1,500 years. Foreigners have bought East Anglian herrings from the days of the Vikings and Saxons. Seven weeks the Yarmouth herring season lasts, during which time something like 400,000,000 herrings are caught. Fortunately the herring breeds at an enormous rate, the mother laying about 50,000 eggs. So there is never a scarcity of the fish each season. The herrings are cured and packed for export to places like Germany and Russia. Last year 845,000 barrels of cured herring were exported from East Anglian ports, twice as many as the year before. The export of cured gutted herrings reached altogether a total of 818,000 barrels.

New High Explosive

An explosive so violent that it drove the pieces of its container shot-hole fashion clear through a nearby bottle without cracking the bottle was recently demonstrated, according to Science.

The new substance is divinyl acetylene, product of remarkable new developments in acetylene chemistry at Notre Dame university. As usual, dyes and explosives are bedfellows in this research, and a brilliant new scarlet color is one of the results of combining acetylene with coal-tar derivatives. This is the first serious and extensive use of acetylene in chemical synthesis, the gas having heretofore been relegated to the domain of the steel welder.

POTATO ACREAGE TO INCREASE

High Prices During Past Year Will Stimulate Production Coming Season, A. T. Erwin Believes

The acreage of potatoes in Iowa and elsewhere is pretty likely to increase considerably in 1926 over that of 1925. This 's the opinion of A. T. Erwin, truck crops specialist at Iowa State College, who bases his prediction upon the record of past years, which, he says, shows that a short crop with high prices has been followed with a crop above normal in 23 out of the last 26 years.

"Three factors contributed to last year's potato shortage and the present high prices." says Mr. Erwin. "The first was a short acreage. Low prices for the previous two years caused many either to drop out of potato production or to cut their acreoge in 1925. We may expect an increased acreage from this group in 1926. The other two factors which cut the 1925 crop were dry weather at a critical period and an early freeze.

"The potato belt extends over a wide territory and it is seldom that these crop failures come two years in succession over such an area. Only 3 times in the past 26 years has a poor crop been followed by another poor one, according to studies made by the Ohio Station.

"Unless the grower has a high batting average as a speculator, his logical program is to plant about the same potato acreage year after year as a part of a definite rotation program rather than to attempt to hop on and off for good or bad markes.

THE AMERICAN LEGION

TWENTY-ONE SHIPS FOR LEGIONNAIRES

Commandant Z. Pechkoff, official representative of the French government, has been in this country for some time co-operating with the officials of the American Legion France convention travel committee, which is charged with the gigantic task of placing 30,000 Legionnaires on French soil when the Legion meets in national convention in Paris in 1927.

With the French government co-operating, through the able agency of Commandant Pechkoff, the plans for the unprecedented migration of the Legionnaires are rapidly approaching completion.

The commandant recently accompanied the Legion's committee to New York city, where sample ships that will carry the veterans to France were inspected. The Legion has chartered 21 ships for the trip, with three or four reserve vessels. Ports of departure are New York, Boston, Montreal, Hampton Roads, Charleston and Jacksonville.

After the inspection of the ships at New York, Commandant Peckhoff accompanied the convention committee to Washington, where they were received by President Coolidge and Henri Victor Berenger, French ambassador.

In speaking of the Legion convention in Paris, Ambassador Berenger said: "The French people will welcome you; all will welcome you as the great Americans whose achievements know no end. All France talks of this unparalleled expedition. Nothing like it has ever occurred before. We of France extend to you every aid possible."

Commandant Pechkoff is an officer and a hero of the famous French Foreign Legion. He only recently returned with wounds from active duty with his battalion in the Moroccan campaigns. His right arm was blown off by an explosive machine gun bullet in 1915. He served with distinction throughout the World war.

Commandant Pechkoff is not a stranger to this country. Following the war he made an extensive lecture tour throughout the nation, speaking about the devastated regions of France. He was received by President Harding in 1921.

Incompetent Guardians Are Being Eliminated

Unfit guardians of children of World war veterans who are receiving compensation allowances from the government are being removed just as rapidly as they can be searched out, declared Mark T. McKee of Detroit, Mich., chairman of the national children's welfare committee of the American Legion. The Legion committee is co-operating with the United States veterans' bureau in eliminating all incompetent and undesirable guardians.

Fully 50 per cent of those who were originally named as guardians of minor children and mentally incompetent veterans were unqualified for the work, veterans' bureau officials have said. Guardians who are qualified for their work are being appointed, according to Mr. McKee.

Organization of the Legion's child welfare service in the various states will be completed in a few weeks.

EVERYDAY HELPS

Honey is one of our most wholesome sweets. It may be given the children instead of candy. Honey may be used in many dishes in place of sugar. Cakes, cookies and pudding prepared with it keep moist longer and are of better flavor.

When picking the feathers from game, like wild ducks, remove the heavier feathers and as much of the down as one wishes to save, then dip the birds into a deep dish of melted paraffin, letting them hang in a cool place to harden. When cold, peel off and free from pin feathers. Reheat the paraffin and use it again, using care that it is not too hot so that it cooks the flesh.

In steaming pudding like suet or plum puddings, which keep for some time, use the pound baking powder cans to steam the puddings. The slices are uniform and much more attractive and there are no broken bits to be wasted. Boston brown bread steamed in these cans is more attractive in appearance when cut.

Keep a small bottle of caramelized sugar for coloring gravies. Melt and brown the sugar in a smooth dry pan; when it is of the right color add boiling water to dilute, cool and bottle. A few drops will add much to any meat sauce.

A pinch of cream of tartar to boiled frosting or fudge will prevent sugaring and will make a nice and creamy mixture.

Cover poached eggs a moment while cooking to give them the pink glazed appearance which is so attractive.

Add a little chopped cabbage and apple to ordinary potato salad to give it a flavor that is different.

Canned pineapple juice cooked with sago or tapioca and served with cream, using a garnish of chopped pineapple, makes a most appetizing dessert.

When bits of yolk get into the whites that are to be used for frosting, remove them by using the egg shell to dip them out of the white.

If a veal or any meat loaf is wrapped in oiled paper before baking it will save loss of flavor and juices, with no hard crust.

Hashed Potatoes.—Chop cold boiled or baked potatoes into small bits. Season with salt and pepper and chopped parsley. To each quart of potatoes add three tablespoonfuls of butter, melt and add to the potatoes; stir until they begin to brown, then add one-fourth cupful of thin cream and set back on the stove to brown. Fold like an omelet and serve with the brown crust on top. Garnish with parsley. Do not use a meat chopper as it will make the potato mushy. A good hash is always chopped in the chopping bowl. Meat loaf is also much better so prepared.

Household Hints.

When hot applications are needed for earache or other troubles, use a lighted electric light bulb against the ear, being careful not to leave it there too long. If wrapped it is liable to cause a fire.

If no electricity is at hand lay a thin layer of papers on a hot cook stove or in the oven where the paper will not burn, lay the cloths wrung from hot water between the folds of paper and keep them hot while going to the patient.

Goose fat is good for shortening for cakes and cookies, biscuit or pastry.

The large cartons that may be obtained from your grocer are fine for packing away clothing. A strip of gummed paper may be placed over the openings and they will be moth proof. When labeled with the contents one may be sure to find what is wanted.

To prevent the cream pitcher from dripping cream on the linen tablecloths rub a little butter under the edge of the spout.

Save the old organ or piano stools for kitchen stools; they are easily put out of the way under table or sink—thus save kitchen floor space.

Make soap from discarded fats. Take five and one-half pounds of fat and one pound of lye. Dissolve the lye in a stone jar in cold water. Melt the fat and when the lye is cold add the fat to it. Stir constantly, adding ammonia and borax to the lye water. Use six and one-half cupfuls of water, two tablespoonfuls of borax dissolved in one-half cupful of hot water and one-half cupful of ammonia. Pour out into a mold or let stand until firm before cutting in cakes.

Water ferns with cold tea or coffee once in two weeks; it makes them grow more luxuriantly.

Patch lace curtains with pieces of net or material like the curtain by wetting the patch in cold starch and ironing it on. The edges if carefully trimmed will not show. When ironing the patch cover it with a dry cloth.

Any dish or receptacle may be sweetened if odorous by turning it upside down on the earth or sod and leaving it for a day or two.

City Lighting Matter of First Importance

An ornamental street-lighting system that affords adequate illumination at night, and also is inconspicuous in the daytime, harmonizing closely with the general scheme of architecture in the various parts of the city, is a source of great municipal pride. A city may have many beautiful thoroughfares, but their beauty is not apparent at night unless they are properly illuminated.

Proper lighting implies that the intensity of illumination should be varied to meet the requirements of the different sections of the city. Streets and avenues in the business districts where the traffic is heavier, for instance, require more light than those in the residential districts. Just the right amount of illumination is as necessary for effective street lighting as is the right method of illumination.

The installation of a good lighting system is something that demands considerable thought and planning. Not alone the street-lighting system, but also the ornamental posts, the kind and shape of glassware, and the proper placing of the posts must be given careful study

There are many streets and driveways which are beautifully lighted at night but which lose all of their pleasing appearance by day. This may be explained by studying the lamp posts. It will be found that the posts installed are huge and clumsy, poorly located, and do not harmonize at all with their surroundings. The posts, in fact, have marred the entire aspect of the street by day.

Vitality and Beauty in Buildings of Brick

Since the day when the Assyrians were in their glory the inventive genius of man has wrought great improvements in brick. Nowadays it is turned out of the kiln in nearly every color and shade, in every degree of coarseness and fineness. It dams a river, it paves a street, it forms the wall of a factory; it adorns the inside as well as the outside of a home.

There was once a time when the mortar joints were regarded as an unwelcome necessity, but that time is past. Modern art has shown that mortar can be made a valuable ally in attaining the ultimate object—beauty. With their units of many colors, the architect and the clever brick worker create a surface which has the look of a skillfully woven fabric, thus the bonding together of brick permits varied effects in what the architects call "texture." Brick has such a quality of humanity as clings to no other substance that goes into the making of a house.

There is always the knowledge that here is the work of human hands—that every piece was made by man and put into place by man. The effect, produced by man's harmonious arrangement of his many units, is one of lasting vitality.

It may be taken for granted that many a home builder has passed brick by because of mistaken ideas about its cost. In these days there is no reason for any man who is planning to build to yearn in vain for a home of brick; he may have it if he wants it.—Detroit Free Press.

Home-Owner's Value

The loss of one potential home owner eventually means the loss of incalculable wealth to the community.

This was the opinion of Howard W. Elmore, vice president of the Chicago real estate board and now chairman of the committee of administration of the sixth annual "Own Your Home" exposition

"When a community falls down on the job of securing even one family as permanent residents, it not only loses the sale of a house and lot, but it loses the 'upkeep' on that family for a long period of years," he said.

"One family may have many children and these children are likely to marry and settle in the same community. When one prospective home owner is lost, the purchasing power of many peopre is lost."

Ideals in the Home

The home is more than a mere shelter; it embodies all the finer things of life. It develops character, culture, thrift and happiness and is the foundation of society. Every one has, at least in a faint degree, some conception of and appreciation for the ideals that are typified in a home. Love, companionship, stability and right living are synonymous with the true home. These characteristics of the home are more highly developed through the fundamental personal pride and interest that grow out of ownership. From a social standpoint, therefore, home ownership has many advantages for both the individual and society.

Mother! It's Cruel to "Physic" Your Child

Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, practicing physician for 47 years, deemed cruel that so many constipated infants and children had to be constantly "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, calomel and nasty oils.

While he knew that constipation was because of nearly all children's little he did not believe that a sickening ge" or "physic" was necessary.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin he covered a laxative which helps to th natural bowel "regularity" if the child is chronically con- . Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pep- only causes a gentle, easy bowel movement, but, best of all, it never gripes, sickens or upsets the most delicate system. Besides, it is absolutely harmless, and so pleasant that even a cross, feverish, bilious, sick child gladly takes it.

Let Tanlac restore your health

If your body is all fagged-out and run down, if you are losing weight steadily, lack appetite, have no strength or energy—why not let Tanlac help you back to health and strength?

So many millions have been benefited by the Tanlac treatment, so many thousands have written to testify to that effect that it's sheer folly not to make the test.

Tanlac, you know, is a great natural tonic and builder, a compound, after the famous Tanlac formula, of roots, barks and herbs. It purges the blood stream, revitalizes the digestive organs and enables the sickly body to regain its vanished weight.

You don't need to wait long to get results. Tanlac goes right to the seat of trouble. In a day or so you note a vast difference in your condition. You have more appetite, sleep better at night and the color begins to creep back into your washed-out cheeks.

Don't put off taking Tanlac another precious day. Step into the nearest drug store and get a bottle of this world-famed tonic. That's the first important step back to health and vigor. Every day's delay means unnecessary suffering, for Tanlac starts to clean out and tone up the system right away. And by acting promptly you will avoid further loss of energy and weight due to your present run down condition. Take Tanlac Vegetable Pills for constipation.

Saves Job and Health

"For a year I felt so played out I could hardly stand up. I was nervous, dizzy, had no appetite and could not digest my food. I had pains in my back and just had to drag myself around.

"But Tanlac turned the trick in my favor. Now I am in as good health as ever in my life; I eat ravenously. Haven't had an ache or pain in months and months. Feel fine all the time."

Ray Roggensack

Like this man, thousands of people give heed to constipation only when it is too late.

"I'll tell you why they wouldn't insure you—

"You allowed constipation to become chronic—until finally it resulted in organic disease.

"People don't realize how insidious constipation is. Its first effects are hardly more than annoyances—headaches, loss of appetite, sleeplessness and the like. But in time, as the body is subjected to continued intestinal poisoning, it may lead to high blood pressure, rheumatism, diabetes or even Bright's disease.

"Stop constipation if you wish to live long. Take a little Nujol every day—that will keep you regular."

Nujol relieves constipation in Nature's way

Constipation is dangerous for anybody. Nujol is safe for everybody. It does not affect the stomach and is not absorbed by the body. Medical authorities approve Nujol because it is safe, gentle and natural in its action.

Nujol makes up for a deficiency—temporary or chronic—in the supply of natural lubricant in the intestines. It softens the waste matter and thus permits thorough and regular elimination without overtaxing the intestinal muscles.

Nujol can be taken for any length of time without ill effects. To insure internal cleanliness, it should be taken regularly in accordance with the directions on each bottle. Unlike laxatives, it does not form a habit and can be discontinued at any time.

Ask your druggist for Nujol today and begin to enjoy the perfect health that is possible only when elimination is normal and regular.

TWEED CAPE-COAT IS POPULAR; MATCHING OF SCARF AND HAT

HAS the new coat you are visioning for spring a cape or at least a capelet effect? If not, why not? For 'tis to ignore a style decree to appear capeless this season.

Having decided that for daytime wear in country or about town the cape-coat's the thing, what question is next in order? Material! A word of five letters gives immediate answer—tweed! For further suggestions as to an ultra-smart springtime utility coat study the model pictured herewith It's the very latest, in every detail.

Handsome colorings inject a note of enthusiastic interest not only in the season's tweeds but in woolen fabrics in general Swagger tweeds which have a decidedly mannish character flaunt bold checks and stripes. Contrasting these are tweeds in lovely heather and moorland tones which tune in so charmingly to springtime beauty. It's the fashion, too, to wear a bright scarf with the tweed coat which but accents the spring color scheme.

If you are wanting a fur collar on your coat of tweed you will find the mode in perfect accord with your wish. If you prefer, a separate fur neckpiece is considered quite as smart.

Unique tailoring features many a tweed coat, such as for instance, a wide plaited skirt section introduced across the back of the coat, with a stitched slot seam extending from the neckline between the shoulders halfway to the waistline at the back. Some straightline models have a subtle flare introduced at the sides by means of plaits which declare themselves only as one steps back and forth.

Among novelty woolen coats, a conspicuous featuring of black and white effects gives zest to the mode. Black and white plaids are boldly patterned, the idea further developed with either white or black fur edgings with fur collars to match.

Various clever details contribute to the interest of the spring tweed coat. An attractive touch of color, for instance, is supplied with bindings of braid or pipings of cloth in a solid shade. The garment here pictured was thus colorfully detailed. Another new finish instead of piping or hemming is to button-hole the edge with wool yarn.

"With a scarf to match, if you please," says milady to her favorite milliner. One has but to look through spring millinery collections to appreciate how enthusiastically creators of the hat-beautiful are responding to this call of the mode. More and more women of fashion look to their milliners to supply scarfs and for that matter other accessories related in coloring and motif to the chapeau. Which is just as it should be. May the vogue increase in favor throughout the length and breadth of the realm of fashion! Indeed, indications trend that very way.

It is interesting to note in the group of matched millinery sets of scarf and hat pictured here that the fashion includes tailored effects for street wear as well as the very dressy types. That very charming little hat and scarf shown to the right at the top is developed of plaid taffeta bordered with machine-stitched solid-colored silk. Of course, the color tone is vividly brilliant, designed, no doubt, to be worn with one of the very smart navy blue tailored suits or possibly with a navy rep coat-dress of swagger style.

As the season advances grows the conviction that we are at the threshold of an era of wide-brimmed hats. Also dressier types are forecast. These will be accompanied with handsome hand-worked scarfs and neckpieces, after the manner of the charming models here pictured.

Exotic coloring marks the richly embroidered scarf of georgette with hat of crochet straw illustrated to the left. It is accessories of this handsome mien which will elaborate the coming summer costume.

It is an allover conventional patterning which contributes a colorful splendor to the millinery set of scarf and hat centered in the picture. An almost solid darning stitch is used working out an effective multicolored motif.

The latest Parisian idea is for the hat to repeat the color of the frock with which it is worn.

The latest style note in millinery is the brimless hat, shaped to the head and expertly draped, preferably of colorful gros grain ribbon.

Writer's Remedy for That Jealous Feeling

Wives who are jealous of other women appear in moving pictures and stories on the first page, but jealousy of this kind doesn't trouble the average wife. There are three reasons why it doesn't trouble her: First, because her vanity tells her that she is attractive to all men and especially attractive to her husband and need not fear competition; second, because she has an unflattering opinion of her sex and doesn't believe that any member of it is qualified to win a man as intelligent as her husband; third, because familiarity has taught her that her husband is very ordinary and she smiles at the thought of his being a heart-smasher.

But if she is not jealous of other women she is jealous of his work, a writer in the Baltimore Sun comments. His work too frequently occupies his mind when she wishes to occupy it. She is made to feel that she is a secondary consideration, even though the work is done for her, and her vanity is hurt. She resents the fact of his work and feels neglected.

It is an unhappy situation, but it is easily remedied. She may find a work of her own, or at least a hobby. Once she has it, she will no longer depend upon her husband for entertainment. She will live much within herself and think her secret thoughts and answer questions in an absent-minded way and be quite self-sufficient.

The remedy has disadvantages, however. You can't rob Peter to pay Paul without offending Peter.

Her husband, made to feel that he is no longer essential to her happiness, will feel cheated and abused. He will find a thousand reasons to condemn her new activity, but the whole crux of his displeasure is the fact that his vanity is hurt. He is jealous because he now is forced to play the second fiddle lately discarded by his wife.

What to do? Well, a collection of children makes an excellent hobby. A wife with five children doesn't worry about her husband's devotion to his work. She has an interest to occupy all of her waking thoughts. And if they cause her to give less time and attention to her husband, he is not made jealous, for the children are his and to care for them is to serve him.

Children are an expensive hobby, but the expense is justified if it affords common interest and takes away the temptation to feel neglected and sad.

Rich Wealth in Colonies

Though Holland, living above her means, is unable to afford a big navy, the defense of her colonies is a question of supreme gravity. The importance to Holland of its overseas possessions was emphasized recently in a speech by Professor Treub, former finance minister and chairman of the Employers' council of the Dutch East Indies. In the Dutch archipelago whose area is 5 times greater than that of the mother country, is a population of 50,000,000. There is invested there $1,200,000,000, three-quarters of which is Dutch and one-quarter foreign capital, on which the annual yield is about $180,000,000. About $100,000,000 is paid in dividends and royalties. Twenty per cent of these dividends accrues to the Dutch treasury. Were Holland to lose East India her industrial and commercial life would be mortally hit.

Latest Diving Suit

The German diving suit used in locating the British submarine M-1 is a rigid suit made of aluminum alloy; the arms and legs are jointed, the joints being made on the ball-and-socket principle. The entire outfit weighs about half a ton and is able to withstand a pressure up to 25 atmospheres, equal to a depth of 750 feet, under test. It is connected with the surface by a light cable containing three independent telephone lines. Inside the suit there is a normal pressure of one atmosphere all the time, therefore it is not necessary to raise the diver by slow stages. The diver also wears over his mouth a mask containing a cartridge which absorbs the carbonic acid, and so enables him to breathe the same air over and over again.

Boston Needed It

A young woman from Indiana who was visiting her married sister in Boston was the guest of honor at a dinner party. During the first and second courses of the dinner she was the center of the conversation with her glowing descriptions of the beauties of her own state. When, for the third course of the dinner, the servant entered carrying a huge fish on a large platter, a Boston lawyer turned to her and said:

"Now you must admit that Indiana is a back number. Who ever saw an Indiana fish of that size?"

"Oh, that's all right," she replied, "the Lord in His infinite wisdom put the brain food where it was most needed."

Market for Jewels

Prior to the World war Russia, Germany and India outdistanced all other countries in the acquisition of gems, but in the last few years the United States has become the most bejeweled country in the world. That with the economic slump following the war, revolutions, high taxes and expensive food and other necessities, the wealthiest people abroad have been obliged to sell their most prized possessions. Most of these jewels have come to America, for taxation places precious stones beyond the reach of British middle-class families.

LIST CAUSES OF RADIO INTERFERENCE

In an official survey of the causes of radio interference conducted by a group of radio authorities in Wisconsin, 53 causes of interference were listed Of this number it was found that only nine could be traced to defective lines of electric companies Considerable time will be devoted to a discussion of this subject at the convention of the Middle-West Division of the National Electric Light Association to be held in Des Moines, April 7, 8, and 9.

Despite this small percentage of blame, electric companies all over the country are taking the initiative in efforts to eliminate all sources of radio interference. Companies are employing radio experts to supervise their newly establ shed radio service departments These departments are being equipped with the most sensitive instruments available with which noises that may be caused by company equipment can be located

In the report of the survey in Wisconsin it was shown that 14 causes of interference can be attributed to defective appliances in the home and 30 can be attributed to radio sets and outside conditions

The official list of the causes of radio interference follow·

More per Cow Rather than More Cows Says U. S. Bureau Chief

© Underwood & Underwood

Dr. C. W. Larson keeps track of milk cows on farms of the country, and how much milk they give.

In a Chicago address, recently, Dr. C. W. Larson, Chief of the United States Bureau of Dairying, made a plea for greater production per cow rather than an increase in the number of cows.

The average cow in the United States yields annually only about 4,000 pounds of milk of which 2.7% is butterfat.

Careful breeding and elimination by test in the milk herd makes an increase to 8,000 pounds of milk annually per cow not impossible with the average dairyman. This would net the milk produced $75.00 above feed cost per cow as compared with the present average of only $26.00

Membership in a cow-testing association and the maintenance of herd records are extremely desirable. The system of records should at least include an identification record, an account of production for each cow—the amount of feed given and breeding dates. For a grade dairy herd, the record system may be quite simple.

Cow-testing associations promote a moro faithful follow-through of the rudiments of dairying. Among them are intelligent feeding, proper stabling, regular milking, thorough grooming, periodical clipping of the long hair from flanks, udder and underline and other attendant precautions against the presence of bacteria in the milk.

In cow-testing associations, records of the milk and butterfat production of pure bred cows are made under the supervision of the association and are given oficial recognition.

BLOODHOUNDS CUT NO FIGURE IN COURT

John Murphy of Crawford county, was awarded one dollar in each of two counts by a jury in the district court at Carroll, he having brought suit against 13 of his neighbors for damages to his character in the sum of $25 000. Much petty thieving had been carried on in the neighborhood and a number of farmers clubbed together and procured a pack of bloodhounds from Waterloo to trace the guilty parties The animals followed an alleged troil to the home of Mr Murphy and believing in the infallibility of the hounds Mr. Murphy was openly accused of the theft although no stolen goods were found on his premises. He entered a vigorous protest and sought vindication by bringing suit. Although he only received a verdict against the 13 men of $2, he nevertheless established his innocence A number of law suits in Iowa have been precipitated because of the acusations made by bloodhounds

METHODIST CHURCH NOTES

A. W. Gauger, Pastor

Miss Edith Huff, missionary from India, spent the day with us last Sunday. It was an altogether profitable day in every way. Her addresses had the right ring to them and she spoke in a most convincing way. The outgrowth of the meetings was clearer understanding missions and of Christ's comand to go into all the world and preach His gospel. The Thankoffering in both churches surpassed any that have been taken here since our pastorate here. The response was simply splendid Some however were not able to attend and thus could not contribute. Such may do so still. Kindly see the president or the treasurer.

Next Sunday is Palm Sundap and our services will be in keeping with the occasion This should be marked by strong attendance on the part of the children and youth. Our services are planned to thot end and we will say things of interest to children.

It is our plan to observe Passion Week beginning with Palm Sunday. We will have services every evening next week commemorating the sacrificial dath of Christ leading up to Good Friday. The service on Good Fridoy will be a morning service. All these services should be a time of quickening and for the deepening of the spiritual life of all Christians, and we cordially invite all whether you belong to this church or another, including such as may not belong to any church to join us in this season of profitable meetings.

All this will leod up to a splendid climax on Easter Sunday when the usual Easter joy will come to full expression.

We have the promise of several neighbor pastors to be our speakers next week and all will have a message to you.

"To balance its tail," was the reply.

HAWKEYE ATHLETES ARE NOW BRINGING HOME THE BACON

Iowa Tied For First Place In Bas-KetBall Conference

IOWA CITY, March 24.—Conference honors have been falling thick and fast on the University of Iowa athletes and sportsmen during the past two weeks.

By virtue of seven victories and no defeats, Iowa holds the undisputed championship in rifle shooting. An Iowan also holds the individual record in this line of sport.

At the Big Ten indoor track meet in Evanston the Iowans again ranked in the top position, so have an undisputed championship in track for the first time in the history of the school.

Additional laurels for the Hawks are a tie for first in the conference in basket ball and a tie in wrestling.

38,590 GIVEN HELP BY SALVATION ARMY IN 1925

DES MOINES, March 24.—The total value of relief given by the Salvation Army in Iowa during 1925 was $19,442.04, according to the annual report of the organization announced by Adjutant Norman S. Marshall Eight thousand seven hundred and eighty-four families representing 38,590 persons were given relief by the Army during that period

The Womens' Home and Hospital cared for 167 girls and 114 babies, the report shows. Thirty men were sent to Salvation Army institutions and sixty-five more passed through the Industrial Home.

Christmas toys were presented to 3,926 children and 7,551 persons were given free Christmas dinners. Free transportation to hospitals and employment was donated to 150 people.

Among the necessary articles of life given to the needy by the Army are 17,859 garments, 3,547 pairs of shoes, 10,400 loaves of bread, 450--700 pounds of coal and 9,482 meals other than Christmas dinners.

Three common mistakes in feeding Iowa cows are: (1) Not enough of the feeds available; (2) Not enough protein; (3) Not enough attention to individual cows.

NORTHERN POTATOES BEST FOR SEED

Iowa Grown Early Ohios, Cobblers Hurt By Hot Weather

Due to the heated periods during the summer of 1925 the usefulness of Iowa grown Early Ohios and Cobblers for seed has been almost totally destroyed, according to C L. Fitch, truck crops specialist of Iowa State College.

Mr. Fitch advises all Iowa growers to get northern grown seed for planting in 1926 unless Rural New Yorker seed is available which was planted late in 1925. The results of the various yield tests which have been run throughout the state during the past few years have shown that the best seed for Iowa growers under almost every circumstance is northern grown seed of early varieties, Fitch reports.

"SPUD" SEED TREATMENT PAYS

Northern Iowa Farmers Attribute Success To This Practice

By immersing their potato seed into a solution made up of 2 pints of formaldehyde to 30 gollons of water heated to a temperature of 125 degrees F, the farmers of Mitchell, Clayton, Dubuque, Scott and other counties in the northern part of the state have produced potatoes which grew to maturity disease-free and in sound condition, says D R. Porter, extension plant pathologist of Iowa State College

Several of the leading potato growers in this part of the state attribute their success in raising potatoes almost entirely to this method of seed treatment. C. G Goplerud of Mitchell County reports that potatoes have been treated cooperatively with hot formaldehyde in his neighborhood for the past five years, at the rate of about 100 bushels per year The potatoes are brought to a central place and are all treated at one time. A chareg of about five cents per bushel is made to cover the cost of treating Hoyt E. Buttolph, another farmer of Mitchell County says that he has reduced the scab in his potatoes from 30 to 5 percent by the hot formaldehyde treatment

The potato growers in northern Iowa have found that the formaldehyde treatment eliminates many of the common diseases which affect potatoes, such as scab, scurf and blackleg. Mr. Porter states that one of the most important points in favor of the formaldehyde treatment is that it is compartively inexpensive and very effective.

BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS ERADICATED IN SEVENTEEN IOWA COUNTIES

Hancock County Is In List Of Those Modified And Accredited

DES MOINES, March 25 —"There are now seventeen modified accredited counties since Calhoun, Fremont and Jackson counties have completed the work of reducing bovine tuberculosis to less than half of one per cent," states the Iowa Department of Agriculture.

The seventeen counties which have completed the work are Appanoose, Calhoun, Clarke, Clinton, Dickinson, Fremont, Hancock, Hardin, Jackson, Jasper, Kossuth, Polk, Pottawattamie, Wapello, Warren, Winnebago and Worth.

Not a single member of the Iowa legislature has asked Governor John Hammill to call a special session of that body for the enactment of a bank guaranty law. This was Hammill's reply to current reports that strong pressure is being exerted upon him to assemble the lawmakers Not only have the legislators failed to demand any such call, but formal presentation of the request by petition or otherwise has been lacking, the governor stated. Hammill admitted there is considerable sentiment for a guaranty law in communities effected by bank failures. If request for a special session is formally presented, the state's chief executive will give it consideration and investigation, h stated.

"JOE LABRADOR."

SYNOPSIS.—Traveling by canoe on the Mississippi, on his way to Biloxi, in the early days of the settlement of Louisiana, William Brampton, English spy, known to Indians and settlers as the "White Indian," sees a Natchez Indian post a declaration of war against the French. For his own purposes, he hastens to Biloxi to carry the news to Bienville, French governor. Brampton meets an old friend, Joe Labrador, Indian halfbreed, who warns him Bienville has threatened to hang him as a spy. Brampton refuses to turn back. He falls in with Jules and Basile Mattor, on their way to Biloxi to secure wives from a ship, the Maire, bringing women from France. At Biloxi Brampton protects a woman from a sergeant's brutality. She tells him she is Claire Dahlsgaarde, picked up in a raid in Paris. Evidently well bred and educated, she is a mystery to Brampton. He intervenes to prevent a man, English, known as "Old Six Fingers," following her to New Orleans. A Frenchman, Francois Narbonne, slightly demented by stories he has heard of the riches of the New World, introduces himself. Bienville accuses Brampton of treachery, but the latter secures a respite from death by revealing the Natchez declaration of war. He is to await the arrival of a former companion, Damoan the Fox, who will exonerate or condemn him. Damoan has documents proving Brampton an English spy. Brampton receives a message from Claire, begging him to help her reach the English settlements. Brampton trusts Narbonne with a note to Claire promising to meet her at New Orleans. He plans his escape. After a struggle Brampton wrests the incriminating papers from Damoan and escapes from Biloxi.

I dipped into it and found the parched corn excellent and the bear's fat fresh. After my hard travel it was most palatable. I sat down and began eating. The Choctaw squatted on his heels before me, an expression almost indicating amusement lighting his eyes.

"What is your mark?" I asked, meaning his clan.

He stared over my head at the green branches for fully a minute; then answered.

"Long Claw comes from the Panthers. You are the White Indian from Biloxi."

This startled me, and put me on my guard, although I gave no sign as I nodded a careless affirmative. It would appear that the news of my flight had kept up with me.

"You also come from Biloxi?" I asked. He shook his head, saying:

"From a hunter's camp north of Biloxi. Two of my brothers live here with the Bread-Eaters."

He pointed in the direction of the Pascagoulas' village.

"Did you see the Frenchman they call the Fox pass your village on his way to Biloxi yesterday?"

There was an almost imperceptible flicker in his small eyes; and without waiting for the proper pause he immediately shook his head.

"I have eaten nearly all your corn, and now I must pay for it," I insisted.

"There will be a big feast tonight and I shall have much to eat," he answered, teetering back and forth on his heels.

With a Scream a Panther Might Have Sounded He Leaped Forward With His Ax.

He was a clumsy liar. It is a characteristic of many red men I have met to be as obvious as children when they try to deceive. Why should he carry a pouch full of corn if his journey from Biloxi was to end with a feast at Pascagoula bay? When he filled his pouch with corn and bear's fat he had expected to follow a trail which might take him to Pensacola.

I abruptly said:

"My medicine tells me you stand in the shadow of death. Is there any one to make a Last Cry for you?"

His eyes nearly closed and the powerful chest rose and fell quickly. When he spoke, however, his voice was composed, and he quietly said:

"I am of the Panther clan. I am a hunter. When I die my spirit will be very happy. My people plant corn and melons. I live by hunting, and the white man is spoiling the hunting. My ghost will be happy even if I have no wife to make the last cry. Does the White Indian's medicine tell him any more?"

"It tells that the path to Pensacola is very bad for you. I must cross the bay and take the path to the Spaniards," I said, rising to my feet.

His lips tightened. My departure was hurrying his plans and he did not like it. Suddenly he raised a hand for silence; it was a squirrel scampering through the foliage overhead.

"The White Indian shall take a little meat with him," he whispered, staring up into the green branches while he plucked his bow from his shoulder and strung it.

Without removing his gaze from the leafy canopy he drew a reed arrow from the quiver and placed it on the string. Then he commenced circling the tree, his head tilted far back. I could trace the movements of the squirrel by the slight stirring of the leaves. It began descending the trunk, and as it did so the Indian's head slowly reverted to a more normal position, and his outstretched hands holding the drawn bow gradually ceased pointing toward the zenith and swept forward to follow the telltale rustling down the tree trunk. Triumph flashed in his eye, and my medicine warned me I was a fool to stand there and be butchered, that the squirrel had given Sharp Claw his chance to strike.

He gave a quick low cry, and shifted his aim, and I went down on my face and felt my fur cap snatched from my head by the passing arrow. With a scream a panther might have sounded he leaped forward with his ax, while I tugged at my pistol. Had it missed fire, as it sometimes did, my chances would have been practically worthless. Down he went with both hands outstretched and nearly touching me, and for a bit we two lay there, the quick and the dead.

My first thought was to make the shore of the bay and signal for the packet to take me off. Common sense stepped in and told me to hide the dead man, as it might be the greater part of the day before the Mattors came inshore.

I cast about and found a hole, where the roots of an upturned oak had lifted the soil; and therein I placed the man of the Panther clan, who died because of treachery; also because he was a clumsy liar. Working swiftly I carefully obliterated all signs of the killing. Fortunately we had not grappled and disturbed the turf. A cunning rearrangement of moss and forest mold hid the dark stains left by the Claw when he fell on his face with the heavy pistol ball through his heart.

Making north from the scene of the fight I bent over a branch of a baybush to mark direction. I repeated this sign several times, knowing the Fox or his Indian allies would accept it as a token from the dead man.

Having done this much to mislead the enemy, I stole back to the shore and concealed myself. I dared not make a smoke for fear those on my track, or some of the Pascagoulas, would investigate it.

Now that I had a breathing spell I made myself comfortable in the underbrush at the edge of the timber and opened up the package of papers Damoan the Fox had carried inside his hunting-shirt. The first one I opened was my Canadian report, the data I had so foolishly entrusted to Damoan for delivery. Putting it in my pocket I gave my attention to the other papers. There were three of them, all from men high in the affairs of the colonies, and each directing my attention to a different branch of inquiry.

Any one of the four papers would have proved my occupation beyond a shadow of doubt and sent me to dangle in a noose. How Damoan had ingratiated himself into the good graces of my correspondents to the extent of making them believe he was a firm friend of mine and could be trusted to bring me instructions was a mystery. Had he delivered my Canadian report that act alone would have gone far to establish him as a good friend of the colonies. But he had obtained his evidence without surrendering my report.

I went over the list of inquiries, mentally checking off those I already had made, and memorized the others. Then I dug a hole deep under the bole of a white oak and buried all but my report on the French north of the Ohio. That document I risked on my person for a while longer. And, accustomed to snatching my rest when I could, I stretched out and went to sleep.

Voices were sounding close by when I opened my eyes. The sun hung low. Three pirogues had put in to allow four Pascagoulas to land. Nearly a dozen Indians remained in the dugouts, up to their knees in fish. What the four coming ashore were after puzzled me until I saw two of them carrying a net, and making for a sand-pit directly below my position, while the other two made for the grove with their bows and arrows in their hands. Their companions pushed off. The two on the beach emptied a quantity of clams on the sand and began gathering dry driftwood.

The men disappearing in the timber were after squirrels, or any other small game. Roasted clams and broiled squirrels! My mouth watered and I watched them enviously as they built their fire. Gradually a wisp of smoke climbed into the brassy heavens, increasing in volume as the clams, wrapped in seaweed, were thrown on the coals. What at first I took to be a gull, caught in the level sunbeams, became a sail. The boat drew nearer, practically running before the wind.

Here was an unforeseen dilemma. The Mattors had observed the smoke and had accepted it as my signal, and were coming in to take me off. Did I fail to show myself they would become frightened and put back to open sea and go about their business. If I showed myself I would startle the Pascagoulas, who would at once report the incident, and Biloxi would soon learn the truth. While I was willing the whole coast should think me safe in Pensacola I did not wish to bring punishment on the Mattors.

The boat lost the wind as it drew inside the bay and made slow progress toward the smoke. While scouring my wits for a way to avoid the clam-eaters and make the packet, a shrill cry rang out in the oaks behind me. It was a yelp of astonishment, possibly fear. The Indians on the sand leaped to their feet and started wildly toward the timber. The cry was repeated, this time in a signal, and the men below me gave an answering whoop and rushed for the grove. This second cry was one of discovery, and I believed the hunters had found the body of Sharp Claw.

Dismay was quickly replaced by a sense of satisfaction; the dead man had drawn the Pascagoulas from the shore. I only asked that Damoan and his red allies had found my signs and had hurried on toward Pensacola while I was asleep. Should they be at hand to witness the exhumation of the Choctaw they would know my signs were decoys and that I was not bound for the Spanish settlement.

The packet was now near enough for me to recognize the two Mattors. I had expected to swim for it, and if not for my musket it would have been simple enough. But before taking to the water I glanced up and down the shore and discovered a small pirogue. Running the risk of being seen I ran to this and pushed it into the water and paddled for the boat.

"Feet of the devil! Why did you not wait!" groaned Mattor pere, as I climbed aboard and kicked the pirogue free to drift ashore with the incoming tide.

I threw myself flat in the boat and Basile growled:

"The eyes of the world are watching us."

"Enough talk!" I commanded. "There is no one on shore but some Indians. You must work the boat between Isle au Aigle and the Dauphine and sail for Pensacola."

"For Pensacola!" exclaimed Jules.

"When the sun goes down we'll change our course for Pontchartrain. There you will drop me and I will pick up a canoe. I have the pistoles I promised you."

"Monsieur is a gentleman. It is right we should help him," declared Basile. "Ho! ho! See how red the sun is!"

Mattor the elder crossed himself, and I heard him muttering: "There is blood on it!"

I wondered if it were an ill omen for me. I hoped it was the blood of Sharp Claw, the Choctaw.

CHAPTER VI

I Keep an Appointment.

Without incidents of interest the packet anchored at sundown in the mouth of the little Bayou St. Jean, or Tchoupic, as it still was known to many settlers. The Mattors had completed their bargain, but so happy were they over earning their pistoles without being brought to book by Sieur de Bienville they were loath to leave me in the swamps and marshes without canoe; and Jules Mattor frankly said:

"It not only would offend my heart to leave you stranded in this muck, monsieur, but it would endanger my head. Without a canoe you will be found; then his excellency would surely ask how you get here. You did not swim here. He would know ours was the only boat to come this way since you escaped from Biloxi. Enough. Basile, have the kind heart to find a log canoe for monsieur.

Basile was gone but a short time when he returned with a small pirogue, which he said he had "borrowed" from some of Le Page du Pratz's people. Entering this with my gun and a bag of smoked meat, I paddled into the swamp growth, while the Mattors lost no time in putting about and working the packet into a light breeze and sailing south, doubtless to hide up in Lake Borgne for a while. Their alibi, if I were discovered by my enemies, would be of a geographical nature.

Keeping close to the bank and under shelter of the overhanging willows, I worked along slowly until the splash of a paddle ahead sent me into hiding. It was quite dark under the arching trees and I could not have told whether it was a white, red or black man approaching had not the fellow started a song popular on the St. Lawrence. As he drew abreast of my hiding-place I softly called:

"Joe Labrador!"

"The good saints!" he ejaculated, swerving his canoe with a swirl of his paddle and making toward me. "Halloa! Who calls to me from the dark in the voice of a white man?"

"The White Indian," I cautiously replied.

"Diable! Monsieur Brampton! What terrible folly! With the whole Gulf-Pensacola-the-upper-river, to travel you come here?" he growled. "And monsieur did me the honor to call me tete de bois! Are you indeed mad, my friend?"

"Feet of the Devil! Why Did You Not Wait!" Groaned Mattor Pere.

"Why shouldn't I come here?" I asked as his canoe slid against mine and we grasped hands.

"Because word has been brought to la Nouvelle Orleans this very morning for the people to watch out for you, to take you prisoner and return you to Biloxi."

"We waste words. Why are you paddling down the bayou to the lake at the edge of night?"

"Oh, I go to the mouth of the bayou each night. Perhaps I am curious to know who enters the bayou."

"You have been watching for me to come!"

"Such is my weakness, my friend. Yes. Now we have met you must paddle back to the lake and up the Iberville. If you lack anything you shall stay here until I can bring it."

"What I lack must come from la Nouvelle Orleans," I whispered. "We will go there together. No one will see us. I will stop outside the settlement. You shall go inside and find a certain person and say a word from me. The person will come with you to me, I think."

He laughed without any amusement.

"Oh, there are quite a few persons who would be glad to come with me to you. It is impossible, monsieur."

"Then I must push on alone. Goodby."

"Hold! I turn my canoe about. Follow me, madman! Tonnerre! Let his excellency hang us both and have done."

He was paddling up the bayou, and I followed him. When he halted within the village the straggling lights of New Orleans—that la Nouvelle Orleans which so many immigrants had been led to believe was another Paris—seemed very near.

From just beyond a warehouse came the thin sweet notes of a flute.

"Are Rouge and his people still here? There were six in his family two years ago. One of them played the flute," I said.

"Some will be here now, but their cabin is farther down. And they are all devoted to his excellency's interests," was the significant reply.

The girl is about to come back into the picture. Who is she and what is she after?

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 83

Old Folks Need a Mild Laxative —Not a "Physic"

Most men and women past fifty must give to the bowels some occasional help else they suffer from constipation. One might as well refuse to aid weak eyes with glasses as to neglect a gentle aid to weak bowels.

Is your present laxative, in whatever form, promoting natural bowel "regularity"—or must you purge and "physic" every day or two to avoid sick headache, dizziness, biliousness, colds, or sour, gassy stomach?

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin helps to establish natural, regular bowel movement even for those chronically constipated. It never gripes, sickens or upsets the system. Besides, it is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take.

Buy a large 60-cent bottle at any store that sells medicine and just try it for yourself.

Suddenly Lost Desire for That Porterhouse

Abe Schwartz looked up quickly as a shabbily dressed colored man entered his grocery and meat market in Irvington and demanded "the best and thickest porterhouse steak what you got."

"All right," Abe answered as he brought out an extra choice cut of meat, "you can have it just as thick as you want it. Just about how shall I cut this?"

The customer held his fingers apart, indicating about two inches. Then he hesitated an instant.

"About how much would it cost for one that thick?" he queried.

"Well, it would run somewhere close to 75 cents."

The colored man gave a long, shrill whistle, then exclaimed:

"W-w-what—seventy-five? Oh, man, jes' give me a nickel's worth of liver."—Indianapolis News.

When Hanging Mirror

To hang a mirror flat against the wall, the screws should be attached as near to the top of the frame as possible. The higher the screws are the closer the mirror will be to the wall. Sometimes it is possible to fasten the screws to the top edge and this proves the most satisfactory.

SPORT HATS ARE GAY IN COLOR; NEW FROCKS STRESS FEMININITY

TO BE sure, a hat may appear "oh, so simple," but is it? 'Tis true, at first glance, to the uninitiated, even the most sophisticated hand-worked hat may look the part of "sweet simplicity," but try to copy it. Aye, there's the test! Study the design, count the stitches, then let the verdict be given. "Stitches" did we say? "Strokes of the brush!" would be just as correctly spoken, for hand painting this season has become a definite factor in the decorative scheme of fashion.

It is time to buy a new frock for Eastertide draws near. What shall its fabric be? Comes the answer straight from fashion's headquarters—choose some one of the durable yet sheer materials, for the thin silk weaves are going to be very stylish this season. In the darker colors they are thoroughly practical, and navy blue particularly gives promise of widespread vogue. The last word from Paris is for black georgette frocks for very smart occasion wear. These show little trimming except a lavish fluttering of draperies and set-on punels and multitudinous godets shirrings and ruffllings. The extreme of the mode finds expression in georgette combined with taffeta. Two outstanding favorites are navy georgette with matching taffeta also gray.

Some Handsome Sport Hats.

It is colorful handcraft inimitably executed which gives distinction to the group of handsome sports hats here pictured. Straw and fabric, likewise hand painting and embroidery, play an intriguing part in the designing of the models in this collection of smartest spring styles.

A note of outstanding chic in the hat of green openwork straw shown first in the group is its imposing high crown with its gigolo crease. Note, too, if you please, that its wee brim turns up at the back, which, according to fashion's decree, is the proper thing for it to do this season. The embroidered flowers are in purple and rose, with green faille silk edging the brim.

Something very new and extremely fashionable is crocheted straw. Of such is the oatmeal-colored sports hat to the top at the right in the picture. The flowers are in multicolor, and hand woven into the background.

If your preference is for other than a sheer transparent fabric, the mode recommends any of the handsome silk crepes, notably flat crepe and crepe de chine. From force of habit, the woman of conservative taste will select a dark shade, but the trend of fashion is just as surely toward joyous springtime colorings. It will take real strength of mind to resist such alluring shades as the lovely new rose tones, artistic greens, blues, yellows, mauves, grays and many more as charming which may be summed up in one word—pastel.

Shows Trend of the Mode.

Hand painting glorifies the charming peanut straw sports hat pictured to the center left The motif is of modernistic inspiration, expressing vivid yellows, greens and reds. There is a binding of silver ribbon with a tailored bow of same at the back. A tassel of silver is one of the mode's pleasing whims for frock or hat.

Quilted millinery is a fashionable theme. The imported sports hat shown last in the group is of white faille silk, all-over quilted with gold metal thread, then embroidered in green, brown and orange.

Fabric, however, as exquisitely colorful and as finely textured as it is these days, is not the only expressive part of a charming springtime frock. So much depends upon the making. This season's modes abound in intriguing detail which bespeak the consummate art of the stylist. The frock in the picture is representative of the trend of the mode to create types which interpret a charmingly feminine spirit. One of the newest colors, verdigris green, is chosen for this dress of crepe Louise. The front shows gathered panels in apron effect, finished with deep band of cream lace. Apron drapes are very modish.

You Can't Smoke History

A fellow from Carolina wants to know where I get the idea that "Bull" Durham and George Washton come from the same state. s, "Why don't you write and the people the real History of ull' Durham in its native State, South Carolina, that people would appreciate that more than these Bull Legends of yours."

Now thanks, Sir, for your good-natured suggestion. If I knew History I wouldn't be able to write "Bull" Durham Ads. I would be a College Professor, get everything right, and get nothing for it. Everything you suggested me telling the public about when and where "Bull" Durham originated, has been told for 66 years by typical Advertising writers. That's the only thing the Company asked of me was "please don't tell again where it came from, or how." You see you didn't read their Ads, but you did read mine and remembered it, because it was wrong.

Writing Ads that will be remembered is a queer game. This is an Ad, not a History. I selected Ads over History on account of the pay. (American Tobacco Company's pay is as good as its tobacco.) Where "Bull" Durham comes from or where it goes to is left for the starving Historian.

CORNSTALKS CUT PRODUCTION

Effects of Good Breeding Offset By Inferior Feed Allowance

Last January a herd of 12 purebred dairy cows in Dallas County returned a profit above feed cost of $1.06 per head. The same month, another herd in the same county, consisting of 10 grades, gave a net return of $9.15 per head above feed cost. The difference in profit of more than $8 per cow was due to the difference in feeding, according to the cow tester of the county. The purebred herd was forced to run in the cornstalk field, while the other herd was cared for similarly except that the cows were kept out of the corn stalk field.

The experiences of these two Dallas County farmers—one with the highest producing herd in the cow testing association and the other with the lowest—illustrate what may be expected where good dairy cows are run in the stalk field, acording to the dairy production specialists at Iowa State College.

VETERANS AIDED BY REED-JOHNSON LAW

Additional benefits of $28,811,113 have been received by some 55,000 disabled World war veterans under the operation of the Reed-Johnson bill, which was passed in June, 1924, under the sponsorship of the American Legion.

Approximately 30,000 of the 55,000 benefiting by the liberalizing provisions of the law had never before received compensation from the government in any form, according to information received from the United States veterans' bureau by Legion rehabilitation officials in Washington.

Twelve thousand veterans suffering from tuberculosis were awarded $13,000,000 in compensation. Mentally incompetent veterans got $7,500,000 in added benefits under the new law. Dependents of disabled veterans to the number of 4,336 received additional allowances totaling $300,497, and 12,344 dependents of deceased veterans received increased allowances amounting to $1,154,280. Veterans received in allowances for nurses and attendants $525,800. Nearly $1,000,000 in compensation was awarded to 800 veterans in the so-called "willful misconduct" cases.

Nearly 10,000 veterans have obtained hospital treatment under the general hospitalization provision of the Reed-Johnson bill. This provides that veterans may get treatment regardless of the nature or origin of their ailment.

Hundreds of thousand of cases which had been lying untouched in the veterans' bureau, because inadequacies in the law prior to the passage of the Reed-Johnson bill, made it impossible to take favorable action upon them, are now being reviewed by the veterans' bureau. This review, which was suggested by Legion officials, is now well advanced.

Additional extensions and clarifications of the laws affecting the disabled were sought from congress at its session beginning in December, 1925. "When these extensions and clarifications are made," Watson B. Miller, chairman of the Legion's national rehabilitation committee, declared, "the most remarkable milestone in the progress of the United States towards the rehabilitation of its war disabled will have been accomplished."

Cut Out Red Tape in Reinstating Insurance

The department of Minnesota of the American Legion has recently announced a plan that will cut much of the red tape that tends to prevent veterans from reinstating their insurance, according to recent announcement at department headquarters at St. Paul.

The Legion has proposed that the posts hold a series of special insurance meetings with two government representatives, a physician and an insurance executive present to examine the applicants and take definite action on their individual cases. This, the Legion pointed out, would eliminate virtually all red tape, which became so distasteful to the former fighters that many of them are willing to sacrifice their federal insurance to avoid further entanglements.

The plan will be tried out in Minnesota and if the response warrants it national Legion officials will be approached with a view to extending the movement to all states, said Edwin L. Lindell, department adjutant.

War Risk Policies for New Jersey Policemen

When Joseph F. Deegan, service officer of the American Legion connected with the veterans' bureau office at Newark, N. J., heard that four policemen in Raritan township had been refused insurance by old-line companies because of the "hazardous nature" of their occupation he took steps by which the men are now adequately insured by the government. Deegan found that the policemen were all ex-service men, and hence could reinstate their war risk insurance policies. The township of Raritan took out the policies for the men under a blanket policy.

Professional Pride

"Someone was telling me," remarked Mrs. Jones to her new cook "that your husband is a close follower of the papers."

"Indeed he is, mum," replied the cook. "Why, they say he's the best man the department's got for keepin' the parks picked up."—The American Legion Weekly.

COOLIDGE'S FATHER IS LAID TO REST

Simple Rites for President's Parent; Interred in Family Cemetery.

Plymouth, Vt.—The funeral of Col. John Calvin Coolidge, sturdy Vermont pioneer, was held from the home in which he had lived for so many years and in which, three years ago, he had sworn his distinguished son as President of the United States.

In keeping with the wishes of the colonel, so often expressed, and also in keeping with the wishes of President Coolidge, the services were simple. Immediately after the funeral the President returned to Washington.

Rev. John White, the Episcopal minister who conducts services at the church across the road from the colonel's house, officiated. Everything except the precise time for the rites had been dictated by the colonel himself several weeks bfore he died.

There were no hymns at the funeral. The President insisted upon this. There were no hymns for his mother when she was buried, he recalled, and he wanted none for his father. There were no church services. The simple rites were inside the old home, after which the body of Colonel Coolidge was taken up to the little cemetery on the hill a quarter of a mile away.

The colonel died while his son Calvin was speeding by special train to his bedside from the White House in the vain hope of clasping his father's hand in farewell. The President was accompanied by Mrs. Coolidge, their son John, and party.

At the deathbed were Doctor Cram, Mrs. May Johnson, the nurse; the colonel's housekeeper, Miss Pierce, and Deputy Sheriff Angus Macaulay. All these had been his faithful attendants during his illness.

Both houses of congress, government officials and foreign diplomats paid tribute to the memory of the President's father. From all parts of the country came thousands of messages of sympathy to President and Mrs. Coolidge.

The senate adopted a resolution of condolence on the motion of Senator Dale (Rep., Vt.), and adjourned without transacting any business. The house adopted a resolution offered by Representative Garret (Dem., Tenn.), the minority leader.

Three weeks before his death Colonel Coolidge transferred to his son, Calvin, the farm on which members of the Coolidge family have lived for generations. The farm consists of 225 acres with the white farmhouse which was the President's boyhood home.

The colonel died ostensibly penniless, although a man of substance. Neighbors say that all property other than the land was made over to the President during his lifetime. Plymouth never knew the value of the Calvin G. Coolidge estate, and the same secrecy was maintained in the case of the colonel's property.

In addition to the homestead, the President owns the lime kiln lot which is the Coolidge sugar orchard. This tract he inherited from his grandfather.

Carcinoma, a form of cancer, was given as the cause of Colonel Coolidge's death. It affected the region of the bladder, his physician said, with myocarditis, an inflammation of the heart muscles, a contributing factor.

WASHINGTON BRIEFS

The house voted against inserting an amendment in the District of Columbia appropriation bill to withhold the salary of any teacher or official who permitted the teaching of "disrespect to the Bible, partisan politics, or that ours is an inferior form of government."

Continued improvement in the relationship between the United States and Mexico is expected by President Coolidge.

Criticizing the delay in the construction of an outlet to the sea for the Middle West, Senator Deneen (Rep., Ill.) told the rivers and harbors board of the War department that what the West wants is less talking and more action.

President Coolidge has accepted as a gift a young wildcat, which until recently roamed the Great Smoky mountain of Tennessee, but he specified that shipment was to be made direct to the National zoo.

Proposals to provide for local option votes by congressional districts in the elections this fall on the wine and beer question have been introduced by Representative Hill (Rep., Md.), leader of the wet group in the house.

HANG ARMY OFFICER FOR GIRL'S MURDER

Lieut. J. S. Thompson Pays Penalty on Scaffold.

Manila.—Second Lieut. John S. Thompson of the United States army was hanged here for the murder of his seventeen-year-old fiancee, whom he said he could not live without or marry because of his insufficient salary. He was the first American officer to be executed in peace time.

Calmly, and without making a statement, the young officer, who was twenty-five years old, walked to a scaffold in a warehouse at Fort McKinley, after a day spent with his spiritual adviser and his attorney.

Thompson killed Miss Audrey Burleigh at Manila in the early morning April 5, 1925. She was the stepdaughter of Capt. Hamilton P. Calmes, medical corps, and they were engaged to be married.

Thompson became despondent because of his inability to marry the girl and said he decided suddenly to kill her and intended to end his own life.

He feared that if the wedding was delayed he would never be able to make Miss Burleigh his wife.

Thompson was tried by court-martial on a charge of first-degree murder. A plea of not guilty was entered, although Thompson admitted that he killed Miss Burleigh. His counsel sought to prove absence of malice or premeditation and obtained a continuance to introduce depositions that Thompson was of unsound mind.

The prosecution, however, produced several physicians who declared that after an observance of a month they were of the belief that Thompson "did not at any time suffer from any mental derangement, either temporary or permanent, and is not so suffering now."

When the court reassembled the prosecution read a signed confession by Thompson.

Thompson was appointed from the ranks to the military academy at West Point. He was graduated with the class of 1924.

The body will be sent to Thompson's parents at Far Rockaway, N. Y., on the next trip of the army transport Thomas.

Alaska's Trade Shows U. S. Made Good Deal

Juneau, Alaska.—Trade figures compiled by John C. McBride, collector of customs for the territory, show that Alaska, for which the United States in 1867 paid $7,200,000, exported $62,223,735 worth of products in 1925 alone. The territory closed the year with a favorable trade balance of $29,024,224. There was an increase of $1,828,133 in the total value of the merchandise shipped from and into Alaska.

The territory's total commerce was $95,423,246, of which $33,199,511 was imported and the balance exported.

Gold, silver and copper production materially increased.

The fish industry showed a slight decrease, the total being $38,163,845 in 1924 and $37,609,451 in 1925. The shortage was attributed partly to a small salmon run in the Bristol bay district and to restrictions made by the government for preservation of the industry.

117,135,817 TO BE POPULATION JULY 1

Figures Will Show Increase of 11,426,197 Since Enumeration in 1920.

Washington.—The population of continental United States will be 117,135,817 next July 1, the census bureau has estimated, the figure being an increase of 11,426,197 since the last federal enumeration in 1920.

Since last July the bureau recorded a gain of 1,757,723. The estimate was based on actual census counts in eight states last year, and on data concerning births, deaths, immigration and emigration since 1920.

Using as a scale the distribution of population increase between 1910 and 1920, the bureau has estimated the population of each state, substituting state census figures where state counts were made last year and omitting calculations for states which recorded decreases between 1910 and 1920.

States which counted population last year were Florida, Iowa, Kansas, Massachusetts, New York, North Dakota, Rhode Island and South Dakota.

The bureau has not yet tabulated the population of the large cities, but will do so later, using the system of arithmetical progression which has been found the simplest and, in the majority of cases, most accurate formula.

Population estimates and actual counts by states, showing New York and Pennsylvania retaining their rank of first and second, respectively, follow:

Alabama, 2,526,001; Arizona, 444,708; Arkansas, 1,903,048; California, 4,316,459; Colorado, 1,058,722; Connecticut 1,606,491; Delaware, 240,274; District of Columbia, 527,880; Florida, 1,317,160; Georgia, 3,138,962; Idaho, 522,175; Illinois, 7,202,083; Indiana, 3, 124,499; Iowa, 2,422,915; Kansas, 1,820,896; Kentucky, 2,524,210; Louisiana, 1,198,591; Maine, 790,053; Maryland, 1,580,268; Massachusetts, 4, 197,288; Michigan, 4,305,051; Minnesota, 2,051,306; Mississippi, 1,790,618 (1920 population); Missouri, 3,498,143; Montana, 604,965; Nebraska, 1,384,703; Nevada, 77,407 (1920 population); New Hampshire, 453,608; New Jersey, 3,680,482; New Mexico, 388,146; New York, 11,303,296; North Carolina, 2,857,846; North Dakota, 641,192 (1925 population); Ohio, 0,600,146; Oklahoma, 2,342,474; Oregon, 877,477; Pennsylvania, 9,613,570; Rhode Island, 092,794; South Carolina, 1,826,021; South Dakota, 689,340; Tennessee, 2,467,679; Texas, 5,312,661; Utah, 513,711; Vermont, 352,428 (1920 population); Virginia, 2,518,589; Washington, 1,538,228; West Virginia, 1,669,324; Wisconsin, 2,884,734; Wyoming, 235,689.

Sunday Baseball Now Legal in Kentucky

Frankfort, Ky.—Sunday baseball, both semiprofessional and professional, now has legal approval in Kentucky.

The state legislature on its last day before adjournment passed over Governor Fields' veto the Strange-Hamilton law repealing a portion of Kentucky's blue law statute which prohibited playing of baseball and participation in other sports on Sunday.

Governor Fields returned the measure to the legislature with his veto message and it was passed over his veto in the senate and sent to the house, where, after lacking by two the necessary constitutional majority, it was called up again and passed with two more votes than the constitution requires to override the veto of the chief executive.

Police Chief Faints Trying Tear Bullets

Chicago.—Chief of Detectives William Schoemaker fainted while testing a tear bullet, the invention of a Cleveland chemist. Upon recovery, the chief was so impressed with the efficiency of the invention that he recommended the purchase of 500 bullets for his men.

The tear bullets cost 50 cents each and are as effective as tear bombs, which cost $7 apiece, it was said. They are fired from police revolvers and fumes from the bullets cause the temporary stupefaction of all those within a radius of 15 feet.

When Chief Schoemaker fired one of the bullets in a room at the detective bureau, he and Sergt. Joseph E. Hogan were temporarily knocked out.

Paroled Convict Robs 60 Homes in St. Louis

St. Louis.—James Beauvaski, thirty-five, confessed to police he had committed sixty residence burglaries here since last November 30, the day he was released from Joliet (Ill.) prison, where he served a part of an indeterminate sentence following conviction at Peoria, Ill., on a burglary charge.

Community Building

To Be Prosperous, Town Must Have Attraction

Go into two different towns, one in which the houses and front yards, the curbing and paving of the streets, the sidewalks, and the like, appear dilapidated and unkempt, and then into a bright, active and progressive town where the houses are beautifully designed, the streets are paved, with rows of trees and parkways, and you will feel the difference between depression and discouragement on the one hand and elation and prosperity on the other. You would waste no time, it is certain, in deciding on which community you would choose as a place of business or residence.

But aside from the use which beautiful face brick offers in the wall surface of the house, it has many other uses in which it adds very much to the attractiveness of the surroundings. For instance, the garden wall, steps or terrace can be very beautifully laid out in brick. There is a possible harmony between vegetation and the beautiful colors of this material. Then there are interior uses which are very appropriate and decorative, as well as lasting.

The entrance hallway can be laid up in brick, making a very attractive, decorative effect. The kitchen may be finished in salt glaze or enamel brick, which would be very permanent, sanitary and economical. Of course, nothing could be more appropriate than a beautiful brick fireplace or two, one in the living room downstairs, let us say, and one in the bedroom upstairs—always an attractive feature in the room if properly constructed and always useful and cheerful, especially in the early spring and late fall.—Better Homes and Gardens.

Established Fact That Beauty Pays Dividends

A picturesque hotel in a little town would be a boon, instead of the usual box-like structure, but you may guess that a picturesque hotel would cost $85,000 more than the box-like structure. Why is beauty so expensive; and why does ugliness save money—if it does?

That query is inserted advisedly, says F. H. Collier, writing in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. What if the picturesque hotel attracted wide attention; and the attention attracted passing guests motoring through, who spread its fame among others, and presently the hotel required a new wing for their accommodation and then another wing?

And if its location fortunately was a happy one among trees, where it added to its charms, a fountain and an old English garden and a swimming pool, presently the picturesque hotel would blossom out as a "resort."

Of course, its chef as well as its manager must be a person of good taste and resource. In the end, properly managed, beauty pays.

Early Zoning Ordinance

Springfield, Mass., claims to have one of the oldest zoning ordinances in the United States, perhaps in the world. At a town meeting held in February, 1649, more than 250 years ago, the citizens of the town ordered that no barns should be set up in a certain highway, and that, if anyone transgressed this order, it would be permissible for the selectmen to order the building torn down.

Fifty years later the selectmen laid out several highways of almost unprecedented width, some of 20 rods' width, or 330 feet; some of 10 rods' width, or 165 feet; and others 6 rods wide.

Playground Tests

One hundred and seventy-eight cities have entered 311 playgrounds and athletic fields in the national playground beautification contest announced by the Playground and Recreation Association of America. Forty-one states and Canada are represented by the cities competing for the $4,650 in cash prizes and nursery stock to be awarded by the Harmon foundation.

New York is the most populous competitor, and Antreville and Coward, S. C., are the smallest, each boasting 100 persons. However, the metropolis will not compete directly against the villages, as all entering cities are divided into three population groups.

Factory Improvements

The modern American factory is far different from the dingy brick structures that one still sees in parts of Europe. It seems to be built chiefly of glass; its ventilation is scrupulously regulated; its floors and walls are swept and washed, and every precaution is taken against dust which might play havoc with machinery and delicate tools, as well as with the health of the employees. We are practically forcing such factories on Europe, because Europe is learning that she cannot compete with us successfully unless she adopts our methods.

Recreation Grounds

The Playground and Recreation Association of America has had 19 years of successful experience in promoting public recreation. When its work began, 41 cities reported organized public play, but now there are 711.

GOOD ROADS

ARD ROADS WILL HELP MERCHANTS

erchants invariably report an in-se in their volume of business n a hard-surfaced road leading to f town is opened for traffic. This been clearly demonstrated in many munities. The following editorial m the Oshkosh (Wis.) Northwestern a specific instance:

Without question the hard-surfaced ays helped to increase the vol- of local holiday trade. Many oppers came to Oshkosh from points rty and forty miles away, some of m in private autos, and others in auto busses now in operation. ese bus lines were taxed to the lt, and with the favorable combina- n of good weather they maintained ir schedules with gratifying reg- arity. The growth of this business ring the past season has been a elation of what can be accom- shed along this line.

"When the highways are properly pro-ed, it is a safe prediction that similar service will reach every sec- on with'n fifty miles of Oshkosh. All is territory naturally is tributary to shkosh as a marketing and shop- ing center, and Oshkosh is naturally terested in obtaining and holding the ade of this rich and populous sec- ion. The way to do it has been dis- losed by what already has followed he improvement of the public high- ays, and the people and business in- erests of Oshkosh have good reason o favor and encourage further im- rovement of the highways until a per- ect system of good roads is obtained

"The benefits and advantages will e mutual, for quick and easy trans- portation is a convenience that pro- motes the welfare of all. Of course, e appreciate the service of the rail- oads and the electric lines, but modern, improved highways through- out this section is the next big de- velopment, and it will do much to add o the success and prosperity of Osh kosh and all adjacent sections."

Highway Research Board Seeking Low-Cost Road

Natural earth roads, which compose 35 per cent of our rural highway system, have been the subject for a series of studies by the federal highway research board.

"We realize what a great economic waste this is," says Prof. S. S. Steinberg of the University of Maryland. "when we consider that one-third of all the automobiles in use are owned by farmers, most of whom are compelled to use the earth roads.

"Many attempts have been made to solve this problem. North Carolina has used a sand asphalt surface, made up of a mixture of 93 per cent sand and 7 per cent of asphalt.

"Realizing that this is one of the most important problems confronting highway engineers, the highway research board is attempting to co-ordinate completed and current research on the subject with the hope of developing a low-cost road surface that will be suitable for light traffic."

Illinois Paves Roads to Save Maintenance Costs

The vast saving in annual maintenance charges resulting from the paving of Illinois' roads is indicated by comparing the cost of maintenance in Illinois and Iowa. The report on Lincoln highway maintenance in Iowa shows that it cost $201,371 to keep in repair the 380 miles of the Lincoln highway in Iowa last year. Eighty miles of the transcontinental road are paved, subtracting greatly from the total expenditure, but even then the average cost of upkeep was $529.92 a mile. In Illinois where the entire mileage of the Lincoln highway is paved, the maintenance cost is estimated at $17,646.20 for the same period or an average of $103.80 a mile. Apparently, if the Lincoln highway were paved entirely across Iowa a yearly saving of $426.12 a mile would be effected, or over $162,000 a year.

Good Roads Notes

Highways, roads and streets cost America one and a half billion dollars annually.

* * *

Good roads are not being constructed fast enough to take care of the increase in vehicular traffic.

* * *

Secondary only in importance to the necessity of a more extensive road building program in the United States is that of keeping those roads open for traffic 12 months out of the year.

* * *

Better highways are proving trade builders for the traveling salesmen and customers and with automobiles are enabling the commercial men to cover larger territories with greater comfort and convenience and at less expense.

* * *

A total of more than $8,000,000 will be received for the eleven months of Michigan's 2-cent gasoline tax which went into operation last February 1. The eight months' receipts from Minnesota's tax effected May 1 will aggregate $3,750,000, it is estimated.

BANKERS SURVEY STATE BANK LAWS

Find That Movement for State Guaranty of Bank Has Gone Into Eclipse.

New York.—A survey of state banking laws conducted by the State Bank Division of the American Bankers Association shows marked progress toward greater uniformity and more efficient bank supervision, it is declared by Frank W. Simmonds, in charge of the division, in a statement giving the results of the investigation. He says that the movement for state guaranty of bank deposits appears to have gone into eclipse.

"The division has urged that the office of bank commissioner be freed from politics and all other functions of state government and tenure be made more secure with sufficient compensation and discretion to attract men of outstanding ability," Mr. Simmonds says. "Gratifying progress has been made during the past year in improving bank legislation in many states. Idaho, Wyoming and Oregon have led by adopting entirely new state banking codes, while Texas and Montana have new codes in preparation.

Uniformity Among State Laws

"The survey shows that it is generally agreed there should be a high degree of uniformity among the states in laws dealing with certain fundamental principles of bank organization, regulation and supervision, and there is a strong tendency in this direction. We find a very definite trend toward increasing the minimum capital requirements of banks to $25,000, creation of banking boards to act in an advisory capacity with the state bank commissioner, and legislation empowering bank commissioners to take complete charge of insolvent banks and to liquidate them as distinguished from liquidation through the courts.

"We find also a trend toward legislation providing for closer supervision of building and loan associations; more equitable taxation of banks; legislation providing for the conversion or consolidation of banking institutions; the legalizing and licensing of what is known as 'branch banking'; broadening the field for investment of funds of savings banks and trust companies, and increasing the power of the bank commissioner as to granting or denying charters for new banks, and authorizing his making reasonable rules and regulations governing bank management and prescribing penalties for the violation thereof.

"Additional general characteristics of state bank legislation are for increasing the compensation of the bank commissioner and lengthening his term of office of four, five or six years, with power to appoint necessary deputies and examiners; legislation providing for the reduction of mandatory bank calls to three and reducing the number of examinations required by law annually to one; making issuance of worthless checks a misdemeanor; limiting or prohibiting an officer or director of a bank borrowing from his bank unless his collateral is approved by a majority of the board of directors, and limiting or prohibiting the opening of branch banks.

Eclipse of Guaranty Movement.

"The question of state guaranty of bank deposits appears this year to have passed into an eclipse, so far as the extension of the idea is concerned, notwithstanding the fact that state guaranty laws were recommended by the governors of two states, and bills were introduced in several of the states, all of which were defeated. The general tendency, so far as state guaranty of deposits laws are concerned, is distinctly the other way, the exceptions being that several states having guaranty laws are trying to free themselves from this legislation. Oklahoma has abandoned the state guaranty of deposits, and last year the South Dakota legislature has repealed the state guaranty law and has referred the repeal to the people at the next general election for ratification."

BANKERS RAISE FUND OF $500,000 FOR EDUCATION

A fund of $500,000 to endow scholarships and research in economics in American colleges was recently established by the American Bankers Association in celebration of its Golden Anniversary. The intention of the Foundation is to promote education in the direction of sounder general economic understanding. Half the total sum represents subscriptions by the American Bankers Association, the American Institute of Banking and individual bankers, and the other half quotas assigned to bankers in each state. The Association gave $50,000 from its reserve funds, and the American Institute of Banking, through individual subscriptions from its members, who are chiefly clerks in the banks, subscribed $25,000. Numerous subscriptions of $5,000, $2,500 and $1,000 each were made by individual bankers in all parts of the country.

TWO SEPARATE ACCIDENTS DO NOT CONSTITUTE TOTAL DISABILITY

George Pappas of Mason City was a brickmaker by trade and while feeding clay into a grinding machine he caught his left arm in the gearing and the limb was so badly damaged that amputation followed. Under the workmen's compensation act he was allowed damages. When the wound caused by the amputation was healed he returnd to his old job and in a few months he caught his other arm in the same machine and it had to be apmutated also. With both arm gone he made application for an award for total disability, but the district court ruled that inasmuch as his affliction was the result of two distinct accidents there was no law justifying the claim for total disability. He appealed the case to the supreme court and that tribunal affirmed the decision of the lower court and he had to be content with the application of the workmen's compensation act as in the case of the loss of his other arm. "It is evident that the man is totally disabled, but there was no other avenue possible in deciding the case if the statutes are to be used as a basis for law," court attaches claim.

EAT EGGS WHEN CHEAP

May Serve Them For Dinner, Lunch Or Supper

Eat eggs when they are cheap and plentiful, say the home economics workers of Iowa State College. They advise that eggs may well be served for breakfast in the simple forms, such as plain poached or scrambled, or they may be served for luncheon or supper or occasionally for dinner.

Another way of serving eggs which the Home Economics Division recommends is to bake them in bacon rind. Greased muffin tins are lined with a strip of partially cooked bacon and one egg is broken into each compartment. The eggs are seasoned and baked in a slow oven. They are then garnished with parsley and seryed on a platter.

Eggs may also be used in making cheese souffle. The recipe given for this is as follows: 3 tablespoons of buttr, 3 tablespoons of flour, 1 cup each of milk and grated cheese, 1-8 teaspoon of paprika, salt, and 3e ggs. Make a heavy white sauce by mixing flour and fat and then add milk. This is cooled slightly and the beaten yolks of eggs and grated cheese are added. The stiffly beaten egg whites are folded in. Turn into a greased baking dish and bake in a moderate oven. Serve immediately.

School Building Program To Be Launched In Avery Township

METHODIST CHURCH NOTES
A. W. Gauger, Pastor

Our Passion Week services are being fairly well attended and prove to be helpful to all present.

Rev. Osborn, of Rowan, was with us Monday and Tuesday evenings, and preached two very helpful sermons. On Wednesday and Thursday eevnings Dr. Van Metre of Garner has promised to be our special speoker, and we are sure he will have a message for all.

Our service on Goodfriday will be at 10:30 o'clock in the morning, "Ecce Homo," Behold the Man! will be the great theme for that day os in our thinking and meditation we follow step by step the great events that took place during the last week and especially the last day of our Master's eorthly sojourn. This service should command! Every seat in our church should be filled on this occasion.

We are looking forward to Easter Sunday with great expectations, as our services will be featured with things of interest in commemoration of the joyous occasion. Special music is promised, and then the baptismal service—when a goodly number of little folks are to be baptized—will be an impressive part of the morning service. Reception of members into Church will take place at the conclusion of the baptismal service.

Another special part of the service will be a "talk" by the pastor to the boys and girls on the "Origin and Meaning of Easter." This will be within the hour from ten to eleven o'clock and we hope that the Sunday school will be there in a body.

The Easter Sermon will be preached on Sunday evening.

A special Easter collection has been announced in Sunday school. This is to go toward World Service. While some can and will do more, may we not have one dollar from each adult and at least a quarter from each child on this one occasion? This goes toward bringing the Easter to those in heothen countries and will bring greater joy into the heart of each giver, we are sure.

WEDDING BELLS RING

Wedding bells rang in Klemme on Thursday afternoon, March 25, at 4:30 o'clock when Mr. Fred Bell and Miss Katherine Wille were married at the Methodist parsonage. Rev. Gauger read the ritual which pronounced them husband and wife. The young couple were accompanied by Miss Stella Bock ond Mr. Russel Bell. The simple marriage ceremony was used to join these estimable young people and to start them out on life's journey. It was a happy occasion.

Both bride and groom are well and favorably known in and about Klemme, both having lived here practically their whole life. The bride Miss Wille is the youngest daughter of Mr. Henry Wille of this city, and a young woman well qualified to be a real homemaker for her companion. The groom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Bell who live east of Klemme. He has the qualities to be a real husband to the woman of his choice. He has been in the employ of the Klemme Meat Market and we understand that he will continue to work for the firm.

The newlyweds are furnishing a home east of the park where they will set up housekeeping in the near future. We extend congratulations.

(Rev. A. W. Gouger.)

MARRIED!

Mr. Harry Smith and Mrs. Kate Nissen, both of Klemme, stole a march on their friends last week Wednesday when they went to Garner and were married by the Justice of the Peace. The news did not circulate around for a day or so, but the charivari gang paid the newlyweds a visit Thursday evening. We extend congratulations!

AVERY TOWNSHIP IS TALKING OF LAYING PLANS TO BUILD NEW SCHOOL HOUSES

Will Have Special Election April 20 To Start The Ball Rolling

Avery Township is progressive and quite a large percentage of the residents of the township would like to see some new schols built, and so for some time it has been the general topic of conversation when families get together there.

On April 20th it is planned to call an election to vote on whether or not to levy a tax of $3,000 to build a new school house in the township. No special district has been designated on the ballot, but the general sentiment, as we understand it, seems to be that a school will be built to replace the Center School first, as a beginning of a program to build new school houses elsewhere.

When this first school has been built then it is planned reach out and build others in the district.

Avery township is made up of a fine lot of progressive farmers and they want the best possible in schools in their township.

BANK FAILURES EXAGGERATED

The number of bank failures in Iowa in 1925 has been greatly exaggerated. A report from Minneapolis placed the number at 613. The facts as of record in the office of the state banking department place the number of failures of state banks at 49 and the total number of failures including National and private banks, amounted to 84. That averages less than one to he couny.

COST OF FARM AID IMPORTANT MATTER

President Coolidge Will Require All Details.

Washington.—Prior to taking a definite stand with respect to proposed legislation for the disposal of farm surpluses, President Coolidge will require complete details of the cost involved.

It was stated at the White House that he has asked treasury officials and experts of the Agriculture department to prepare estimates on the cost of the legislation now under consideration by the house committee on agriculture, the principal provision of which is creation of a $250,000,000 revolving fund.

When the President receives these estimates, it was intimated, he may take a definite position on the projected legislation. So far he has withheld sanction of any proposal which would commit the government dealing with the agricultural surplus problem.

Proponents of the corn-belt bill, which would finance surplus agricultural products by the levying of an equalization fee, claimed national rather than sectional support was behind the measure.

Chester H. Gray, Washington representative of the American Farm Bureau federation, appeared before the house agricultural committee and read telegrams from federations in 16 widely scattered states, all of which indorsed the measure either specifically or in principle. The farm bureaus favoring the bill included Idaho, California, Nebraska, North Dakota, Michigan, Illinois, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Wisconsin, Kansas, Connecticut and Minnesota.

Reading Her Own "Obit"

This desire for omission does not always spring from the same source, however, as did the ideal expressed by a chronicler of an older generation who declared that a lady's name should only be published twice in her life—when she was married and when she was buried.—From an article in the Saturday Evening Post.

PROPOSES NATIONAL PROHIBITION POLL

Senator Edge Demands Referendum on Issue in November, 1928.

Washington.—Prohibition is to be given a public airing before a senate committee the two weeks beginning April 5. This was determined by the senate judiciary committee, which approved with only a single dissenting vote the program recommended by its subcommittee of five for hearings on pending measures for modification.

The first week will be reserved for presentation of arguments from wet forces; the second week is set aside for the drys.

Washington.—The house unofficial committee for modification of the Volstead act will give the senate judiciary committee first whack at testimony on prohibition and will defer its own hearing set for this week. The committee will co-operate fully with the senate official body and, in addition, has appointed a spokesman to present its views and those of the modification senators to the committee, which will begin its sessions on April 5.

Washington.—A practicable plan to give the American people their first opportunity to express themselves on national prohibition at the polls in the general elections of November, 1928, was proposed in the senate by Senator Walter Edge of New Jersey, leader of the wet forces in congress.

A joint resolution, sponsored by Edge, which would require approval of the senate and house and signature of the President, outlined in detail the method for holding a national referendum on modification of the prohibition law.

Since the vote would be taken in connection with the Presidential and congressional elections, it is held it would bring out the maximum number of voters and furnish an unquestioned expression of public sentiment.

Expressing belief the drys will not be able to cite any acceptable reason why such a referendum should not be held, the wets propose to hammer away until they get action on the resolution, although it is doubtful if it can he had at the present session.

This was manifest from the reaction of the drys, led by Wayne B. Wheeler, general counsel of the Anti-Saloon league. He promptly turned thumbs down on the proposal.

The resolution specifically provides that the referendum is to be held "in order that congress may obtain information necessary for the appropriate exercise of its legislative powers under the eighteenth amendment," and submits this question to the people:

"Shall the congress amend the national prohibition act so as to allow the manufacture, sale, transportation and possession of beverages containing as great an amount of alcohol as is lawful under the Constitution, provided that such amendments shall not interfere with the constitutional powers of the several states to legislate with respect to intoxicating liquors as each state may deem proper?"

The resolution was referred to the senate's judiciary committee.

U. S. Tax Receipts Show Business Is on Upgrade

Washington.—The steady expansion of commerce and industry and a generally healthy state of business again has been graphically shown, in the opinion of treasury authorities, by the latest figures on revenue receipts.

Statistics made public a few days ago disclosed that, despite the uncertainty as to income tax rates that prevailed during February, the month's receipts were approximately the same as for February, 1925. Receipts last month from all sources were $98,072,347, as compared with $98,225,862 for February, 1925.

Thus far in the fiscal year 1926 the total revenue receipts from all internal sources have exceeded the corresponding receipts for the same months of the fiscal year 1925.

LEGION'S CHAPLAIN HOLDS D. S. CROSS

Rev. William E. Patrick of Bakersfield, Cal., national chaplain of the American Legion, is one of the few chaplains of the World war who was decorated with the Distinguished Service Cross for gallantry under fire.

Reverend Patrick won the coveted D. S. C. while serving with the Twenty-third infantry, Second division, in the Meuse-Argonne offensive of November 1 to 11, 1918. The citation awarding him the Distinguished Service Cross reads:

"For extraordinary heroism in action during operations on the the Meuse river, France, November 1-11, 1918. Chaplain Patrick searched for wounded, gave them first aid and assisted in their evacuation under heavy machine gun and artillery fire. His firm determination to go wherever he could be of service, disregarding his personal safety, was a constant source of inspiration to all officers and enlisted men of his battalion."

Rev. William E. Patrick.

Reverend Patrick was elected national chaplain of the Legion at the last national convention at Omaha, Neb., and will serve until the Legion convenes at Philadelphia in October.

Chaplain Patrick has a long and distinguished record of Legion service. His advance has been a gradual one. He first served as chaplain of North Andover post, North Andover, Mass., 1919-22. Then he moved to California and was immediately elected chaplain of Ventura County post, holding that office until 1924, when he was elected department chaplain. Finally came the highest honor at Omaha, where his comrades saw fit to elevate him to the national office.

Reverend Patrick was born at Cambridge, Mass., in 1890. He is a Harvard graduate and holds the degree of A. B. from that institution, as well as a B. D. degree from the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge. He was ordained a deacon in 1910, and ordained a priest in 1916. He is at present rector of St. Paul's church at Bakersfield, Cal. He is married and has a son and two daughters.

Consolidation Plan at Legion Headquarters

Consolidation of four divisions and a redistribution of functions of national headquarters of the American Legion at Indianapolis was put in effect following approval by the national executive committee of the consolidation plan suggested by National Adjutant James F. Barton. The object of the plan is greater efficiency and economy.

Under the consolidation, administration and membership and organization divisions become the administration division. Frank E. Samuel, former director of the organization and membership division, will head the administration division in addition to serving as assistant to the national adjutant.

Emblem and film divisions have consolidated under the title of the emblem division. Oakleigh E. Marquette, director of the emblem division, will retain directorship of this division.

The post activities section is consolidated with the community and civic betterment bureau of the national Americanism commission. The name of the bureau will in future be the community service bureau.

A Fitting Punishment

"When was Mr. Blick ostracized from the club?"

"It was during the world series."

"What was it all about?"

"A group of members were discussing that exciting last game, when Blick came in. 'How's the game coming now?' somebody called anxiously. 'The game?' said Blick. 'Oh, it's improving. My approach was rotten yesterday, but I beat Nibbs three up.'"—American Legion Weekly.

The Brute

"Of course," remarked the young husband in an unguarded moment and apropos of nothing special, "no one is entirely perfect."

"George!" cried the bride, bursting into tears. "You don't love me any more!"—American Legion Weekly.

THE TWO MIRACLES

The yearly miracle of spring,
Of budding bough and greening sod—
Is it less wonderful to view
Than is the Risen Son of God?

What man can call the flower forth
Or bid the buried seed spring up?
Can free the prisoned butterfly
Or paint the golden crocus cup?

No more than he could think or dream
That God could die, that man could rise!
The selfsame power that calls the seed
Out of the darkness where it lies.

Could call the Christ from out the grave.
O ignorant and foolish men
Who watch the miracle of spring,
Yet doubt that Jesus rose again!

Date of Easter Long Matter of Church Dispute

Conflicting Opinions Once Threatened to End in Disruption of Church.

The Easter festival occurs this year on the date determined by the rule that has been in general force—though not quite universally—in the Christian church for just sixteen centuries. Yet the recent proposal to abrogate that rule and give Easter a fixed instead of a movable date seems to be regarded with complacence, as a matter capable of being seriously discussed without evoking charges of apostasy or heresy or causing danger of a schism. This fact denotes the advance that has been made in liberality of thought, since it must be remembered that in early times some acrimonious and persistent controversies were waged over the matter.

As early as the middle of the Second century a marked difference of practice existed between the churches of Asia Minor and those of Italy, leading to an earnest though friendly controversy between the venerable Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, and Anicetas, bishop of Rome; the former appealing to the example of St. John (whom he had personally known) and St. Philip, and the latter to that of St. Peter and St. Paul. In the end neither prevailed, and Easter continued to be celebrated in Asia on the day of the Jewish passover, and in Italy on the Sunday following that day. For a time this difference was an entirely amicable one. But early in the Third century there was almost open war between the two parts of the church. For a century the controversy was violent and bitter, until at last the Emperor Constantine had to intervene, and to direct the Council of Nicaea in A. D. 325 to formulate a rule for universal observance. That was the rule which still in substance prevails, that Easter shall be celebrated on the Sunday following the full moon occurring on or next after the vernal equinox.

Persian Belief Is That World Came From Egg

Some Reasons Why Old, Old Custom of Making Colored Ones Prevails.

The egg has long been looked upon as a symbol of creation or new birth, or regeneration, by leaders of all religions. According to the Persians, the world was hatched from an egg, and, as in the days before Christ, the Parsees still exchange gifts of colored eggs at the New Year's festival. Christianity invested the paschal egg with the new significance of the resurrection of Christ, and eggs were colored red primarily in allusion to His blood, Philip B. Townley writes in the New New York Herald-Tribune.

Going back in mythology to the worship of the goddess Oastre—which appears to be another name for Venus, the spring festival of the ancients having been a form of devotion to Venus—the custom of gifts of colored eggs at that festival has not only remained to the present day, but is now a universal custom throughout the civilized world.

In France at Easter time the parish priest goes among his parishioners to bless their homes, and in return receives gifts of colored eggs. In Russia they carry a number of colored eggs with them on Easter morning, which they present to their friends. In the churches in Russia after the services are over priests and laymen click eggs together in the same manner in which we used to touch glasses indicative of kindly feelings.

In Germany the Easter fete is occasion for a five-day holiday, beginning with Greun Donnerstag and lasting through Ostern Montag.

In this country our Presidents have for many years opened the White House lawn to an egg rolling on Easter Monday, and the popularity of this affair has brought about the present vogue of municipal egg hunts.

Now, in an entirely friendly spirit, I feel that I must correct the statement that "Egg dyes are among the last disappearing reminders of the fugitive and elusive signs of spring—found only in out-of-the-way places in the little old-fashioned shops." The little packages can be obtained in all modern shops in the busiest sections of every community.

Civic societies all over the country are beginning to stage annual egg hunts for the children of the community in the same way that the municipal Christmas tree is now a pretty fixture among civic events.

GLORIOUS VICTORY

The wonder of Good Friday is that the victor lies vanquished by the vanquished one. We have to look deep into the very heart and essence of things before we can see how real the victory is that thus hides itself under the guise of defeat.—Phillips Brooks.

U. S. SAFETY BODY ADOPTS NEW CODE

Three Legislative Proposals Would Govern Issuance of Cards.

Washington.—A uniform traffic code for the guidance of motorists and pedestrians throughout the country was adopted at the concluding session of the second national conference on street and highway safety.

The suggested uniform vehicle code adopted is divided into three parts: A uniform vehicle registration and certificate of title act; a uniform motor vehicle operators' and chauffeurs' license act, and a uniform act regulating operation of vehicles on highways. They are designed as models for adoption by the several states.

The registration act provides for creation of a motor vehicle commissioner at the head of a separate department to enforce the provisions of the act. The department would keep records open to public inspection, post notices of stolen vehicles, revocations of license, etc.

Driving a car without the owner's consent or knowledge, even though without intent to steal, is made a misdemeanor. Receiving or transferring stolen vehicles is made a felony. Willful damage of a vehicle is a misdemeanor.

The operators' and chauffeurs' act provides that every person who operates a car must have a permit. Licenses cannot be issued to persons under sixteen years of age, to persons who have had licenses revoked before the expiration of one year, to habitual drunkards or drug addicts, to the feeble minded or epileptics, or to "any one suffering with such physical or mental disability or disease as will serve to prevent such person from exercising reasonable control over a motor vehicle."

The act regulating operation of vehicles sets the following speed limits: Approaching within fifty feet of a grade crossing, passing a school during hours, traversing a street intersection or rounding a curve where vision is obscured, fifteen miles an hour. Speed is restricted to fifteen miles an hour in business districts, and to thirty-five elsewhere.

Governor Winant of New Hampshire urged the 1,000 delegates to the conference, including representatives of forty-six governors, to take the initiative in placing the recommendations before the various states and municipalities.

Secretary Hoover, in a closing address, warned that if progress was to be made centralized government should be discouraged in favor of government "by stimulation of the local community to its responsibilities and the education of the local community to intelligent action." He declared the work of the conference, if universally adopted, undoubtedly would result in a diminution of traffic laws.

Gooding Bill Loses 46-33 in Senate Vote

Washington.—The middle western commercial interests won a decisive victory when the Gooding long-and-short haul bill went down to defeat in the senate.

The vote was 33 to 46. Those voting for the bill included 18 Republicans and 15 Democrats. Against the bill were 30 Republicans, 15 Democrats and 1 Farmer-Labor member.

By this action the senate declines to deprive the interstate commerce commission of discretionary power to authorize transcontinental railroads to make rates to the Pacific coast from the Middle West to enable them to meet competition of water lines operating through the Panama canal.

Effect of the legislation, if passed, would have been to make permanent the recent decision of the commission forbidding the transcontinental lines to reduce their rates from Chicago and the Middle West to Pacific coast points to meet boat competition.

Defeat of the bill leaves the commission free to permit departures from the long-and-short-haul provision of the law when it determines that evidence has been submitted that justifies such departure.

The main support for the Gooding bill came from the senators from the so-called intermountain states, the Republican and Democratic "radicals," and members from states in the lower Mississippi valley.

Women Demand Law Barring Santa Claus

Vanvouver, B. C.—The Vancouver city council and the Vancouver Retail Merchants' association were confronted with a resolution passed by the Vancouver Parent-Teacher association asking that impersonations of Santa Claus be discontinued. Disillusionment of children, when promises made by the jolly saint in department stores remain unfulfilled on Christmas day, was given as the reason.

The Reason

Rev. J. D. Morrison of Camden, discussing the Baptist convention's resolution in favor of penalizing nonvoters, said the other day:

"The typical nonvoter, when you reprove him, retorts with some complacent and utterly absurd reason for his nonvoting course.

"It reminds me of the man who complained to his wife:

"'A year ago you said our marriage was made in heaven, yet now you order me around something awful.'

"His wife answered calmly:

"'Order is heaven's first law.'"

Danes Colonize Greenland

Two colonies of Danish farmers have gone to Greenland to make an effort to engage in farming on a profitable basis. The colonies will be at Lindenow and at Scoresby sound. Danish sovereignty has been recognized in Greenland by all powers but Norway, and last year Denmark and Norway made an agreement settling Norway's claim by giving it certain commercial rights for a period of 20 years. The agreement ended a controversy lasting for centuries that started because Norway claimed original explorations in Greenland.

Origin of Halloween

Halloween, or All Hallows eve, is the name given to the 31st of October as the vigil of Hallowmas or All Saints day. Though now known as little else but the eve of the Christian festival, Halloween and its formerly attendant ceremonies long antedate Christianity. The two chief characteristics of ancient Halloween were the lighting of bonfires and the belief that of all nights in the year this is the one during which ghosts and witches are most likely to wander abroad. About the first of November the Druids held their autumn festival and lighted fires in honor of the Sun-god in thanksgiving for the harvest. The Druids also believed that on the eve of this festival Saman, lord of death, called together the wicked souls that within the past twelve months had been condemned to inhabit the bodies of animals. On the Druid ceremonies were grafted some of the characteristics of the Roman festival in honor of Pomona held about the first of November, in which nuts and apples, as representing the winter store of fruits, played an important part.

Letters Originally Alike

Originally, says the Detroit News, the letters "i" and "j" were one, the "i" having two pronunciations, just as "u" and "v" were once one letter, with two ways of using it. Without the present dots, as an authority explains, letters "i" and "n" when together might easily be read as "m," etc., and it was to avoid such confusion that the dot over it was adopted. The "j" as a distinct letter came into being through a custom in those days of the scribe giving a tail to an "i" at the beginning of a word, the flourishing being at first for ornamentation only. But since most "i" letters starting a word had the "j" sound, the tail in time became the mark of a letter of its own, the modern "j."

Having started, however, as simply a form of the "i," the little "j" retained the dot like the "i" even after the introduction of printing.

Two Great Americans

Passing through Salisbury, S. C., the writer recalls that here lived two great pioneers—a pioneer in the discovery of a new country and a pioneer in politics. They were Daniel Boone and Andrew Jackson. Daniel Boone, a restless spirit, courageous for adventure, pushed across the mountains to the west of him and laid the foundation for history in Kentucky.

Andrew Jackson, the other pioneer who also lived in this town of Salisbury, studied law, felt his ambition growing and moved, like Boone, across the Blue ridge. He built a log cabin in Tennessee, lived to replace it with a handsome mansion, and then moved into the White House. He made a name for himself in American politics in the late twenties and early thirties by saying what he thought and doing as he pleased.—Toledo Blade.

German Girls' New Tasks

Changing times, changing ideals. The girls in Germany no longer prefer the occupations they once cherished. Such is the testimony of the "adviser for professions," Miss Margarette Schmidt, in Berlin-Mitte. Some years ago girls who had to work turned to typing and stenography Now they prefer dressmaking and millinery occupations. Contrariwise, there is a lack of deaconesses.

INSURE GOOD QUALITY CHICKS

Baby Chick Hatcheries and Farm Flock Owners Back Plan Of Inspecting and Accrediting

A new step has been taken this year by a number of baby chick hatcheries and farm flock owners in Iowa to insure that the flocks from which the baby chicks come are operated on a good basis as regards health, vigor quality and egg production. Under the new plan the flocks from which a number of the baby chick hatcheries secure eggs were given a thoro inspection and several farm flocks underwent like inspection.

The inspection work for the hatchery flocks is being done by the Iowa Inspected and Accredited Hatchery Association, while the farm flock inspection and accrediting work is under the direction of the Iowa Record Flock Association. Altho each of these organizations hires and pays the inspectors, they must be approved by Iowa State College.

The inspection of the flocks was so rigid this year that 25 to 30 percent of the birds were culled from the flocks. Among those culled were the "loafers" or poor egg producers, those low in vitality, the late maturing birds and the ones which did not conform to the standard qualities of type.

A farm flock in order to be accredited had t oconform to high standards both in quality and egg production, while to become certified, a flock had to be made up entirely of birds with at least 200 egg ancestry

Altho some flock owners and hatcheries have been advertising their flocks as "accredited" or "certified" only those which are members of the Iowa Record Flock Association or the Iowa Inspected and Accredited Hatchery Association and have been properly inspected and passed are entitled to use this name, say the poultry authorities.

At a national conference of representatives of baby chick hatcheries, flock owners and others from 27 states held in Manhattan, Kan., a few months ago, uniform rules were drawn up for accreditation and certification work. These rules, which were adopted by the two Iowa associations, are officially recognized the country over.

Buying chicks or eggs from properly inspected or accredited flocks or hatcheries who are members of the foregoing associations should insure good quality chicks, say the poultry specialists at Iowa State College. To know that a flock or hatchery has been accredited or certifid is to have some guarantee of quality of their product.

MORE MYSTERY

SYNOPSIS.—Traveling by canoe on the Mississippi, on his way to Biloxi, in the early days of the settlement of Louisiana, William Brampton, English spy, known to Indians and settlers as the "White Indian," sees a Natchez Indian post a declaration of war against the French. For his own purposes, he hastens to Biloxi to carry the news to Bienville, French governor. Brampton meets an old friend, Joe Labrador, Indian halfbreed, who warns him Bienville has threatened to hang him as a spy. Brampton refuses to turn back. He falls in with Jules and Basile Mattor, on their way to Biloxi to secure wives from a ship, the Maire, bringing women from France. At Biloxi Brampton protects a woman from a sergeant's brutality. She tells him she is Claire Dahlsgaarde, picked up in a raid in Paris. Evidently well bred and educated, she is a mystery to Brampton. He intervenes to prevent a man, English, known as "Old Six Fingers," following her to New Orleans. A Frenchman, Francois Narbonne, slightly demented by stories he has heard of the riches of the New World, introduces himself. Bienville accuses Brampton of treachery, but the latter secures a respite from death by revealing the Natchez declaration of war. He is to await the arrival of a former companion, Damoan the Fox, who will exonerate or condemn him. Damoan has documents proving Brampton an English spy. Brampton receives a message from Claire, begging him to help her reach the English settlements. Brampton trusts Narbonne with a note to Claire promising to meet her at New Orleans. He plans his escape. After a struggle Brampton wrests the incriminating papers from Damoan and escapes from Biloxi. He meets the Mattors and they go to New Orleans in a sailing packet. At the landing place Brampton again encounters Joe Labrador, whom he sends to bring Claire to him.

—8—

"The three Orillant brothers? Can I trust them?"

"Two are here now. They are loyal to France," was the discouraging answer.

"Then there is no one I can approach under the seal of secrecy?"

"No one, monsieur. I must do your errand. Who is the man you wish word taken to?"

"You are to find Mademoiselle Dahlsgaarde, but just arrived from Biloxi. No one is to know you come to find her. You will say to her the three words, 'the White Indian.' Then lead her here if she is still inclined to go with me."

"A woman from the wife-ship! One of those women!" he groaned. "God of the white man! But you will make faces through a noose. With a price on your head—"

'I see I must do my own errand," I broke in. "When my friend believes evil of me he does evil in doing my business."

"Be still, my friend. You annoy me! I will find this woman with the outlandish name. I will speak the words. If she is fool enough to come with me I will bring her here to this dead village."

"She will come. Remember the need of secrecy. She had best wander to the edge of the settlement before you join her. There are those who would follow her. Even now there is one there, perhaps, a man with two fingers gone."

"Ha! The squat beast! He has been to the bayou."

"And one Francois Narbonne. Neither he, nor anyone, must know of the girl's departure. Now good luck and much speed, as the morning must see us far on our way."

"Holy saints! It is like the White Indian to break his neck to help a French wench. He could find no woman to help in all his years on the river until now. Very good. God in his wisdom sees fit to let monsieur play the fool. Why should I try to stop you? I go."

And he had faded into the darkness before I could give him a fitting reply. Of course there was something of madness in my project from the Canadian's unenlightened point of view. I was reluctant to admit to myself even this much, but after reviewing the happenings of the last few days and remembering how few words I had spoken to mademoiselle, and how entirely ignorant I was of her antecedents—unless I retain my first estimate based on her soft hands and obvious poverty—I agreed that my old friend had cause to be displeased with me.

But what could I do after she had written that she surely would die unless I could help her make the coast? Refuse because she had made mistakes? Then how many of us would be licensed to ask for help? Pass her by because, very possibly, she had been frail in her virtues while living in an environment where virtue would find it most difficult to thrive? Then what manito would be lenient enough to listen to poor mortals' agonizing pleas? Strumpet or virgin, she was entitled to her chance and I would do my best for her.

"Is it you, monsieur?" Labrador's anxious voice roused me from my thoughts.

"It is I. Where is the girl?"

"At your elbow, Mr. Brampton," came the answer in excellent English, and a soft hand touched mine. "Those men outside the cabin with lights! Are they looking for me?"

"No, mademoiselle. But it's well we were going. Lead the way, Joe."

"But you are traveling away from the river, monsieur!" she protested, dropping back into French.

"Only to swing back into it a few leagues above here. If you are to come with me you must trust to my judgment absolutely. I will say I think you are foolish to come."

"But not foolish to trust to you monsieur," she murmured.

"Good heavens, no! If you have the slightest doubt about your perfect safety with me—except we fall victims to a common danger—go back to your cabin at once."

"I have no doubts. You are saving me from destroying myself, monsieur," she whispered; and confounded me by beginning to sob.

"You'll betray both of us before we are a league from this spot," I warned. "Say your prayers! Make vows! Do something to hush your weeping! Faster, Joe!"

The good fellow quickened his pace, and I took the girl's hand in mine and we fairly ran for it until we came to the hidden canoes. Then Labrador said:

"I will go ahead. If you hear a night-bird call twice you will know I have met danger and then you must hide by the shore until the bird calls but once, meaning the trail is open again."

With this understanding he drew some distance ahead and led the way down the bayou. The girl crouched low in the pirogue behind me.

We moved slowly along the black water, and between lazy thrusts of the paddle I tried to talk with her.

"Why must you go to the English settlements? Have you friends there?"

"I have no friends anywhere, except that you be my friend," she whispered.

"But why to Virginia, or the Carolinas instead of Canada?"

"This country, it is terrible, monsieur," she mutterely evasively.

"You did not tell Sieur de Bienville that you were picked up in a raid."

I thought she did not intend to answer, but after a long pause she slowly said:

"What would be the good?"

And now she was speaking English with only the faintest of accent. I began to believe she was bilingual and used either tongue without being conscious of shifting.

"But if you could prove to his excellency—"

"I can prove nothing," she passionately hissed. "I have told you I have no friends. Shout the name of Dahlsgaarde from one end of France to the other, and none would be interested."

"Pardon; no one except your people."

"I am alone. An orphan."

"But your friends—at least those with whom you worked."

My voice became confused. I felt her soft hand rest for a moment on my hand as I held the paddle motionless.

"No, it is not the hand of a girl who has worked," I sorrowfully admitted.

With a jeering little laugh she said: "Monsieur Brampton would prefer doing good deeds for the good."

"You are in trouble. I wish you well for your own sake. I will help you if I can. But one cannot help without wishing to know something. I could help you more intelligently if I could understand something of the nature of your trouble."

"There is nothing to learn. I came over on the immigrant ship. I am Claire Dahlsgaarde, as homeless and friendless as if I had dropped from another planet."

"Tell me this, did you protest when the police seized you and bundled you aboard the Maire?"

She astounded me by sadly confessing:

"I wanted to come. I lied when I told you I was taken in a raid. I went alone to the ship just before it was to sail and asked to be taken along."

"Good heavens! If you only had known—"

"I should do exactly the same if it were to be lived through again tomorrow, monsieur. You must either set me ashore to make my own way, or accept me as you find me—nameless, friendless, a waif."

Why nameless when she was Claire Dahlsgaarde, I asked myself. But I did not ask her.

"I will not think evil of you. I wrote you from Biloxi—when it was doubtful if I could even save myself—that I would take you to the seaboard! I only hope your troubles will end when you get there."

"That was nicely said," she murmured, pausing between the words as if fighting to control herself. "If we get to the English towns I will find some work. I will be a servant—anything."

I thought of her soft hands; I already appreciated the refinement of her manner. No; I did not believe her troubles would be ended when she reached the English towns and she would be forced to make her own way. Our servants were supplied from the blacks, or ne'er-do-wells shipped to the plantations from England. As a servant she must abide with her class, and her very softness and her mental qualities would make her an object of scorn among her mates.

Between dips of the paddle I wondered if she would not have fared better to have remained in the valley and accepted a husband from among the women-hungry. This alternative was abhorrent to me almost as soon as I had considered it. I had told myself on the sands at Biloxi that she was entitled to her chance; and certainly a lonely cabin in some miserable lagoon, with a shaggy creature who lacked even the stability of an Indian hunter for a mate, constituted no "chance." Yet for the life of me I could see only a squalid outlook for her did we win across the eastern mountains.

The whole business discouraged analysis; and when Labrador gave his signal from the darkness ahead, and repeated it, I found my mental reaction to be refreshing. It meant danger, but that was more or less tangible. With a thrust of the paddle I had the pirogue snugly under the willows and was cautioning my passenger to be very quiet.

"Tonnerre! But who are you to treat me like this?" loudly demanded Labrador's voice. "Take your dirty hands from my face. To see if you know me? And who the black devil are you?"

This time I heard the murmur of a response and Labrador called out no more. The peril was obvious. Again I warned the girl to make no sound. We were kneeling on the marshy ground, and my hands held the pirogue from rustling against the reeds if the newcomers passed close enough to agitate it with their paddle strokes. Now they were sending little ripples into the swamp-grass, and by ear alone I told when the first craft passed our position.

From the number of paddles I judged it to be a long pirogue. Now it was above us and I was preparing to embark when there came a sound of other paddles, two of them. When directly opposite me a man spoke, and had I my musket by my side I should have been tempted to shoot at him through the darkness, for there was no mistaking the voice of Damoan the Fox.

CHAPTER VII

Up the River.

So the chase had turned from east to west and the Fox was hot on my trail. I thanked my medicine I had lost no time in meeting the girl. Until the Fox could reach New Orleans and make sure I was not hiding there the pursuit would be indirect.

Taking the girl by the arm, I assisted her into the pirogue and pushed off. We barely more than drifted with the sluggish current until I heard the soft dip of a paddle ahead. Then I allowed my own blade to betray me, and Labrador's voice was calling:

"Good evening, Messieurs."

"It is I," I whispered as the pirogue grated against his canoe. "I saw them and him."

"Sacre! He held a pistol to my throat while he pawed over my face with his dirty paw to see if it was you. But my talk satisfied him I knew nothing. He goes to la Nouvelle Orleans."

"He thinks I am there. Did he say anything to show how sure he is?"

"Nothing, except to tell his pirogue Choctaws that the trail would be picked up when they left the bayou."

"He'll find no trail," I said.

"He'll find a woman is missing. And there will be some signs left," declared Joe, now using the Choctaw trade jargon that the girl might not understand.

But I did not fear any such results. There was nothing known in New Orleans to connect me with the girl's disappearance. The settlers would testify that the girl was very sad, that she stepped out of a cabin and did not return. It would be believed that she had wandered away and fallen into the river, or become lost.

As for finding any signs of our passing to and from the Indian village the chances were his Choctaws would destroy any traces in tracking back and forth during the night. But the long river-road was the logical one for an escaping English spy to take, once it was known he had not made for Pensacola; and I believed the Fox would make haste to cut me off from gaining the mouth of the Ohio.

The close air of the bayou was being freshened by a breeze from the lake. It was like emerging from a hot tunnel. Labrador's canoe slithered among the brakes, and came to a stop, and as I drew abreast of him he announced:

"I return to la Nouvelle Orleans, my friends."

In the Choctaw jargon he added, "If they go north I shall trail them."

"They will go north," I assured him.

With that we parted, he to paddle up the bayou, while I took the girl into whatever dangers Fate had stored up for us once we quit the Iberville for the Mississippi.

I could not get used to mademoiselle. If she had impressed me as being slight and frail of physique on Ship island she now seemed little more than a child. For she had followed my advice, and had shifted from her funereal black gown to a garb more suitable for rough travel. From an Indian crone she had purchased some boot-leggings, a short skirt of fiber bark, stained white and red—the sacred colors of the Natchez—and completed her attire with a blouse of linen she had brought overseas. Her yellow hair was drawn back and arranged in braids. Her face would have been boyish if not for the sensitive mouth and the sadness of her eyes.

"And this river flows from the great river?" she asked for the tenth time as we made our way up the Iberville.

"It is merely a mouth of the Mississippi at high water. It flows into Lake Maurepas, where we camped and I showed you the cross cut by Iberville a score of years ago."

She was silent for some time, and then proved she was observing by saying:

"Monsieur does not look behind him. Now, I look back every few minutes, thinking to behold the savages."

"There is nothing behind us to fear, little one. It is when we strike into the Mississippi that we shall keep our eyes very wide open."

"It is terrible, this great river that we seek," she murmured.

She was behind me on the bundle of blankets. I heard a suspicious sound and glanced back to find her striving to muffle a sudden outburst of sobs by lying face down on the blankets.

"Hush!" I sternly commanded. "The great river is our good friend. It is so big and wide we can hide from our enemies without leaving it."

"I hate it!" she fiercely whipped back, lifting her head and glaring angrily at me through her tears. "I hated it while at the cabin of Mariot and his family. I wish we could travel afoot, overland, to the coast. Why must we go the long way around when we could travel overland?"

"To save time," I told her with a smile. "We haven't time to go the shortest way. There are more than ten thousand warriors between the river and Carolina. There are a scant four thousand of these who will admit any feeling of friendship for the English. We must go nearly to the coast before we will be free from the red danger; for there are no settlements in the valley of Virginia. In the valley of the Shenandoah the Catawbas and Cherokees go north on the war path against the Five Nations, while down that path come the Iroquois of the Five Nations to take southern scalps. I do not say these things to add to your uneasiness, Mademoiselle Dahlsgaarde, but to indicate how widespread is the danger-zone, and to show the need of traveling by water as far as possible."

"Forgive me. You are very wise," she sighed, raising her big eyes to stare into mine. "I have seen so little of life. I am so ignorant."

I faced to the front and scowled at the bend ahead. For the time I had fallen beneath a spell and had forgotten she was not an unsophisticated child. Her plea of ignorance did not harmonize with the mystery behind her, nor with the disturbing testimony of her soft hands coupled to poverty.

"I have said something which displeases monsieur?" she timidly asked.

I flashed a mechanical smile over my shoulder, shook my head, and explained.

Claire may be interesting, but she is a terrible handicap on a trip like this. What will she do next?

Bird's Mother Love Example of Heroism

The boy who "stood on the burning deck, whence all but he had fled," has won the immortality of a well-known poem, but probably a certain skylark will not find her poet, although she certainly deserves one.

While beating out a field fire at Feltham, in Middlesex, firemen noticed a skylark sitting on her nest on the ground, in the direct path of the flames. The bird continued to sit on her eggs with dense smoke rolling round her, and even when the flames caught the grass of which the nest was constructed she did not stir until the firemen were close upon her.

So struck were the men with the bird's heroism and devotion that they determined to save her home at all costs. They set about isolating the nest, and were so successful that, although the fire spread all around, the nest was scarcely damaged and the eggs remained intact.—London Tit-Bits.

Glacial Period Floods

When the ice began to melt in earnest toward the close of the glacial period, floods occurred and formed rivers that would dwarf many of our largest ones today. So great were these torrents, says Nature Magazine, that enormous bowlders were rolled along like pebbles, and thus transported miles beyond their original positions.

The real cause of bad breath

"You cannot 'cover up' unpleasant breath for any length of time. The only way to rid yourself permanently of it is by removing the cause.

"Sometimes poor teeth are responsible. But the commonest cause of a coated tongue and offensive breath is constipation. You may not realize that your intestines are slow in eliminating waste matter, or that your breath is objectionable. But others will notice it.

"Get rid of constipation, and your breath will become fresh and sweet. Even more important, you will notice an immediate improvement in your health and spirits."

Nujol relieves constipation in Nature's own way

Constipation is dangerous for anybody. Nujol is safe for everybody. It does not affect the stomach and is not absorbed by the body. Medical authorities approve Nujol because it is so safe, so gentle, and so natural in its action.

Nujol simply makes up for a deficiency—temporary or chronic—in the supply of natural lubricant in the intestines. It softens the waste matter and thus permits thorough and regular elimination—without overtaxing the intestinal muscles.

Nujol can be taken for any length of time without ill effects. To insure internal cleanliness, it should be taken regularly in accordance with the directions on each bottle. Unlike laxatives, it does not form a habit and can be discontinued at any time.

Ask your druggist for Nujol today. Remove the cause of bad breath and begin to enjoy the perfect health that is possible only when elimination is normal and regular.

Constipation! How to Keep Bowels Regular

To Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, it seemed cruel that so many constipated men, women, children, and particularly old folks, had to be kept constantly "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

While he knew that constipation was the cause of nearly all headaches, biliousness, indigestion and stomach misery, he did not believe that a sickening "purge" or "physic" was necessary.

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin he discovered a laxative which helps to establish natural bowel "regularity" even for those chronically constipated. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin not only causes a gentle, easy bowel movement but, best of all, it never gripes, sickens, or upsets the system. Besides it is absolutely harmless, and so pleasant that even a cross, feverish, bilious sick child gladly takes it.

Buy a large 60-cent bottle at any store that sells medicine and just try it for yourself.

DRESS FOR DAYTIME AFFAIRS; SPRING MODES IN HEADWEAR

FABRICS may come and fabrics may go, but the faithful crepes, both heavy and sheer, stay on forever—for which blessing all fashionable womankind rejoices. Of course, it is entirely superfluous to go into any detailed recital of the good points of crepe materials. Sufficient unto the moment, is it, to know that crepe fabrics are more popular than they ever were.

Whatever lack may be in novelty of material is made up in the way of unique styling. One of the interesting features of this season's modes is that the one-piece dress is given a two-piece appearance. Viewing the handsome flat crepe dress, which is shown in the picture, from the front, one would think that it consists of a blouse worn over a circular skirt. However, the illusion is dispelled when one sees that the back portion is cut in one piece. Other of its style details are the long sleeve, self-fabric tie and the braiding which patterns the hem-edge of the camouflaged blouse. There is an air of tailored elegance about this frock, even though a touch of elaboration is suggested in the braiding.

If one's taste inclines to a more ornate styling, the plaid-trimmed crepe frock is the very latest word from Paris. Solid colored crepe frocks, especially navy or black ones, are enlivened with a piping of gay plaid on all available edges. A plaid necktie and plaid furbelows at the wrists add to this animated coloring.

Another very important embellishment for the monotone crepe frock is accessory touches of gilded leather brilliantly illuminated with bronze-paint colorings or batik dyes. Nearly always a fanciful belt accompanies a collar and cuff set of the leather.

In frocks of crepe which show the stylish bolero treatment, bright color is achieved through the waist portion which is attached to the skirt.

Another very prominent feature in the styling of the crepe frock is the necktie and various floating streamers of self-fabric which are often the sole items of adornment on the coat or dress.

While the North is still buffeted by biting winds, the South is basking in summer sunshine, and between the coast of Maine and that of Florida any sort of climate may be found This accounts for the diversity in the millinery styles now on display in the centers of fashion and, incidentally, reveals that Miami and Palm Beach are pointing the way for summer fashions.

Small hats of grosgrain silk, of straw, or of straw and silk combined, appear to be crowding out the little felt hat which has had such a lasting vogue. Although the felt, in light colors, looks summery, it is never a cool hat. The new straws and silks are less plain and more dignified than the vanishing felts—their crowns are higher, their brims are varied.

Three typical shapes shown in the picture are all combinations of straw and silk. The group leads off with a pretty beret—the most graceful of the brimless shapes. It has a crown of silk with a trimming of two-toned velvet ribbon twisted about it. The beret is the inspiration for many draped hats of grosgrain ribbon. Straw and taffeta are united in the youthful hat at the left with moderately high straw crown and upturned flaring brim of taffeta adorned with rows of narrow braid. The same braid-adorned taffeta makes the cluster of rosettes at the right side. A midsummer hat finishes the group—the beloved and perennial leghorn with puffed crown of crepe georgette. One can imagine it in any of the lovely pastel colors with pastel roses and foliage posed at each side.

MR "AVERAGE MAN" RISES TO OCCASION

Power to Meet Emergency, Common to All.

The average man, so we are told, is honest. Diogenes, for all the light of his penny lantern, could not find him, and the editors, who have been looking for him ever since, haven't found him either. He may be honest, that average man! he may be strong for family life; he may never look the other way when the plate goes by at church, nor pass Sally in her blue straw on the corner without a dime to match her smile. He may belong to the Kiwanis, and always land on the green in five—they say he does. I don't know. I never saw him.

No; I never saw him, and the man who saw him I never saw either. The truth is either an advertising agent invented him, or else the department stores did. Have you ever tried on the average man's coat at Fittem & Chargitt's as I have? The name on the g[illegible] it away. It is sure to [illegible] "medium stout" or anything [illegible]ch shows. And [illegible]ero but the average man [illegible] comes to him, and he [illegible]'t do things, and does [illegible]s a story in tonight's paper [illegible]erage cop. He had sworn, it [illegible] not to use his own revolver, [illegible]ome bystander be injured. That [illegible]s a natural, average thing to do. [illegible] when the crook he had just ar[illegible]ted broke away the cop went after [illegible]m with his bare hands. Once the crook shot, twice, three times; then the fourth bullet landed in the policeman's abdomen, but he went right on, clinched with the thief, turned his own weapon on him killed him in his tracks, and was carried off to a hospital to die. Not an unusual story but one which gives you a little more confidence that the chap next you will do his bit when the time comes! And perhaps you will, too.

William James wrote a wonderful essay on the energies of men. He tells how the runner will keep his stride while his heart is bursting within him and his backbone knocks against his ribs. He comes to the utter end and then suddenly, marvelously, comes the new wind. The muscles tauten, his breath ripples easily, and he is off to win the race.

That is the miracle which comes to all of us, which makes every man know in his secret heart that he is just a little better than the next, and that he can win. "I," he whispers to himself "am a Jones. My father was a Jones, before me. Of course I can win—why, after all, they are only average men."—Ellery Sedgwick in [illegible]'s.

Put to the Test

Finklebaum was a good but exasperating tenant, and, being touchy, the landlord did not like to offend him. So one day he cornered the old man and, with his most ingratiating smile, said:

"Finklebaum, I dreamed last night that you came up to my house, rang the bell, asked for me, and, without my saying a word, handed me the money you owe me."

"So?" said Finklebaum. "Do you [illegible]e in dreams?"

[illegible]e a great deal of faith in [illegible]d the landlord, hopefully. [illegible]e me the receipt," said [illegible] 'and I'll believe in 'em too."

HIGH SCHOOL ORCHESTRA GAVE FINE CONCERT HERE

HIGH SCHOOL ORCHESTRA PUT ON WONDERFUL CONCERT FRIDAY EVENING

Gary Has Aggregation Of High Class High School Musicians

The high school orchestra, under the direction of Mr. E. G. Gary, covered themselves with glory Friday evening when they gave their concert at the school auditorium.

The program of standard and clasical music was rendered perfectly A program of this kind is very seldom attempted by a high school orchestra, but we can well feel rather proud to think that the Klemme high school can boast of such a fine aggregation of musicians. Mr. Gary is to be complimented very highly for the time and pains he has taken to get the orchestra to such a high level. TheKlemme school is indeed fortunate to have a man of Mr. Gary's musical ability to direct the school musical activities.

We can frankly say that the concert given Friday evening was the best musical entertainment given in Klemme for several years, and we have had some very good lyceum and chautauqua orchestras here at that.

Themembers of the orchestra are: E. G. Gary, director and violin; Miss Ethel Wellemeyer, Violin, Miss Ruth Bailey, Violin; Mr. Donald Gibbs, Cornet; Mr. Wayne Lemke, Cornet; Mr. Vernon Turgason, Saxophone; Mr. Harl Gimer, Trombone; Miss Elvira Stille, Piano; Mr. Albert White, Drums. Mr. White was unable to play for the concert, having had an accident which preovnted him from being present.

COLD SUMMER IN 1926 IS ALL BIG BUNK

The Season's Snow Past Week Just The Weather Man's April Fool

IOWA CITY, April 8.—The weather man played an April Fool Joke on suffering Iowans when he ordered inches upon inches of snow the beginning of this month. He was only fooling, and this unusual cold snap does not mean that winters are getting any longer or colder than they ever were.

The theory advanced by European scientists that summers are a thing of the past and we are due to have winter all the year around in 1926 is all wrong, according to the statement of Prof. J. J. Runner, University of Iowa geologist.

"According to this theory" said Profesor Runner, "if the summer were to be cold, this last winter would have had to be unusually cold, too And I don't think that it has been any colder than it has ever been.

"The United States weather bureau of the Smithsonian Institution said last fall that there was no reason that his winter should be any colder, although some predicted that it would be."

Because one year Europe suffered from a cool summer, and the crops faild is no reason for believing that we are in for another ice age, as scientists have no indication that there will be a duplication of this phenomenum.

So the April snow was just the weather man's way of saying, "April Fool!" and as he will have his little joke no one needs to fear that he means business.

TIMELY GARDEN TIPS

Make It a "Glad" Flower Garden

Make this a glad garden year by planting a liberal quantity of gladioli. A common mistake is to start all bulbs at this time with the result that the blooming season is comparatively short.

It is a simple matter to have gladioli in bloom from July 1 to frost by planting some every two weeks from the first week in April until the middle of June.

The wise grower will use the smaller bulbs for early planting and the larger ones for the mid-season and late summer crop. Variety in color is unlimited so everyone may be satisfied.

BLUE VALLEY CREAMERY INSTITUTE

DIVERSIFIED farming, with many sources of income, provides the greatest profit, according to the Blue Valley Creamery Institute, which has completed a study of farm income data obtained on 262 farms by investigators of the Wisconsin College of Agriculture. Farms with six sources of income had an average yearly income of $1,504; those with three, $790, while those farmers who were dependent upon only one source of income made less than $500. The big lesson to be gained from this study, the Institute explains, is that the farmer who raises products of many kinds makes a living and a reasonable profit, while the one who depends upon a single kind of animal or crop has only a single source of income and small profits for a year's work.

Cormels, or bulblets as they are commonly called, can be planted in rows like garden peas. Cover about 1½ to 2 inches deep. Soaking in water for 24 hours before planting will hasten their germination.

Bulblets of early varieties, especially of the primulinus type, may bloom the first year. Dig all of them in the fall and handle as mature bulbs.—E. C. Volz, head of the Floriculture Department, Iowa State College.

Get Vegetable Crops Started

In some parts of Iowa certain of the hardy vegetables, such as onions, onion sets, lettuce, radishes, peas, potatoes spinach and perhaps cabbage can be planted or set into the garden now. By taking advantage of the early suitable weather with these vegetables, which are quite tolerant to cool temperatures, you will be enjoying the "spring tonics" long before your neighbors.

Make extra plantings in the hotbeds and keep them in continuous use. Plantings of cabbage, lettuce, cauliflower, celery and others can be made at this time for a succession later in the season after the first plantings have finished yielding.

Be sure to transplant or "prick off" the young seedlings before they become too crowded and give them spaces about 2 by 2 inches apart either in the hotbed or in small boxes placed in the south window of the home. The first sowing of tomato, pepper and eggplant seed in boxes or hotbeds should now be made if you have not already done so.—Ora Smith, instructor in Vegetable Crops, Iowa State College.

SIX LIVES LOST FROM KEROSENE EXPLOSIONS

Des Moines, April 8.—Six people have lost their lives and three others have been sent to hospitols as a result of four recent explosions caused by using kerosene to start fires, according to reports of the Iowa Department of Agriculture.

"We are filing information against the oil company in two cases where the kerosene was adulterated," stated M. G. Thornburg, Secretary of Agriculture. 'Our inspectors are checking up in regard to the quality of kerosene in other cases and information will be filed if conditions justify it."

"Iur records show that all of this kerosene has been of legal test upon its arrival in the state. The accidents have been due to adulterations of the kerosene or careless handling. Undoubtedly additional laws will be necessary to curb this great loss of life and property."

Phosphate fertilizers—either acid or rock phosphate—tend to make crops mature earlier and to improve their quality as well as to increase yields.

BELMOND MAN DROWNS SELF TO ESCAPE BILLS

Belmond Bachelor Leaves Note And Jumps Into Iowa River

Because he was unable to pay his bills with the result that his furniture was attached, Charles Olson, 50, a bachelor, threw himself into the Iowa River at Belmond from the Main street bridge Tuesday morning, leaving his house in flames and a note in the hands of his nearest friend, Rewer Davenport, rural mail carrier.

The note was sent to Davenport by mail and was received by him just as he was ready to go out on his daily route this morning. He went at once to the city officials and with them went to the Olson home.

They found that Olson had set fire to his bed and that part of the furniture had been damaged by the flames, which were quickly extinguished by the fire department.

The body of Olson was found later in the river as told in the note he had sent Davenport.

Investigation disclosed that Olson had a number of debts and obligations which he, for one reason or another was unable to pay. His failure to pay and suit being brought against him, and his being refused loans at a bank to pay the debts probably caused him to committ the act.

Olson came to Belmond from Cornelia last fall. He is also well known around Goodell and near Klemme where he has worked on farms a few years ago.

FARMER'S SON IS GORED BY MAD BULL

Alvin Grell Attacked By Animal He Was Leading At Head of Herd

Alvin Grell, the sixteen year old son of Herman Grell, living northeast of Garner, received a fracture of one of the vertebrae Saturday, when a bull he was leading at the head of a herd of cattle, charged and gored him.

The boy was thrown into the air by the infuriated animal but clung to the chain attached to the bull. Two farmers who were driving the herd came to his rescue and beat off the animal with clubs.

The attack came suddenly and without the slightest warning. The youth was walking ahead of the animal and received the blow in the middle of the back. He was taken to a Mason City hospital where his wounds were attended. Besides his injury to his back, he was bruised otherwise and will be forced to remain in bed for some time and will be obliged to wear a cast for about six months.

SOME TIMELY TIPS THAT MAY INTEREST THE FARMER

"BAD DIRT" KNOCKS EGG YIELD

'Tis Another Case of Raising Young Chicks in Old Yards

"Sometimes a flock of chickens can be wormy to the extent that the egg yield is checked badly, even tho the birds may not show outward signs of worms, and recently such infestation was called to my attention in Wapello County," says J. H. Bardsley, poultry extension specialist of Iowa State College.

"The Wapello County farmer had formerly been a large and successful hog raiser. He decided to extend his operations to include poultry some four years ago. The first year he had 150 laying hens and he secured excellent results from them in the way of egg production.

"Spurred on by his success the first year, this farmer increased his flock the second year and received a good profit, tho not equal to the first year. He again increased his flock the third and fourth years, but his profits decreased and in the fourth year the egg yield did not come anywhere near paying for the feed.

"Despite the very poor egg production, this four-year-old flock appeared, on the whole, to be in good, thrifty condition. A few of the birds, however, showed colds and were not very healthy in appearance. When we held a post mortem on some of these less thrifty ones, we found they had a considerable number of worms probably just enough to hold down egg production and yet not enough to show up very badly in the outward appearance of the hens.

"Upon talking with this Wapello County farmer, I found that he had raised his young chicks in the old poultry yards where they had run with the older birds. It was another example of trying to raise young chicks on foul grounds. It pays these days to raise the young chicks on clean grounds where poultry has not run for some time."

FEED BABY CHICKS SOUR MILK

It's One of Surest Preventatives of White Diarrhea

Sour or clabbered milk as a feed for chicks is one of the surest preventatives of white diarrhea available. So says H. A. Bittenbender, head of the Poultry Husbandry Department at Iowa State College. Where plenty of milk is available it is a profitable practice to give no water to the chicks during the first six weeks, sour milk to constitute the only drink.

Care should be exercised in feeding sour milk, for sharp changes in the acid contnt from day to day almost always cause bowel trouble. A safe rule to follow is to feed today's milk tomorrow. Then the acid content will remain very nearly the same.

Buttermilk, especially if bought at commercial creameries, is not as satisfactory a chick feed as sour milk, even though the food value is almost the same, for the acid content of buttermilk is likely to fluctuate widely with each churning.

It is best to feed the milk in earthen or enameled vessels, for they are much easier to clean than other types of containers, and cleanliness is a big factor in the success of baby chick feeding.

MAN AT LUVERNE, MINN. VOTED FOR TWENTY PRESIDENTS

LUVERNE, Minn., April 8.—Jap La Due, former state senator, believed to be the only living American to have voted for 20 presidential candidates and to have a public career dating back to the administration of Franklin Pierce, started out Tuesday upon his "century year". He was 99 years old April 6th.

PLANT NORMAL CORN ACREAGE

Situation Seems to Warrant no Reduction, Holmes Finds, After Study of U. S. Report

It looks like good business for the Iowa farmers to plant about a normal acreage of corn this spring, despite the rather unsatisfactory price received for cash corn this year is the opinion expressed by C. Holmes, head of the Agricultural Economics and Farm Management Department at Iowa State College.

Dr. H olmes bases his opinion on a study of the recent report from United States Department of Agriculture, entitled, "The Agricultural Outlook." This U. S. Department report covers the entire agricultural situation of the country and in order to interpret it from the standpoint of Iowa farmers, Dr. Holmes has prepared a pamphlet entitled, "The Year Ahead in Iowa Agriculture." This takes up the general situation of agriculture, and analyzes the corn, hog, beef cattle and dairy situations. Copies of this report may be secured by writing to Iowa State College, Bulletin Section, Ames.

Since much Iowa land is better adapted to corn growing than to other purposes, Dr. Holmes asserts that any considerable reduction in the corn acreage of the state would result in a lower utilization of the resources of the Iowa farmer. Further, he points out that except for about 15 or 20 counties in northwest Iowa, farmers in the remainder of the state normally feed more corn than they produce.

Weather and not acreage has determined the size of the corn crop during recent years, Dr. Holmes says. Although the last corn crop was large, the actual acreage was 3 million less than for the five year period, 1909 to 1913. The acreage of corn in the corn belt varies little from year to year. Except for 1917 when the acreage was increased bout six percent, the number of res has not varied more than o two percent, Dr. Holmes says.

Since the volume of corn production cannot well be governed cause of the influence of weather Dr. Holmes suggests that it may be practical for livestock farmers to hold corn from bumper crops yea to augment the supply from short crop years. Studies made last fall by workers in Dr. Holmes' department show that in bumper years it nearly always pays to hold corn over until the next crop is made, but that in short crop year, holding corn seldom pays. A report was issued the costs and profits of storing or last fall, opies of which may be secured upon request to Iowa State College.

"FLY SALT" AND BOGUS INSECTICIDES NO GOOD

Des Moines, April 8.—A new ey making scheme is being on Iowa farmers under the of Fly-Salts, according to entomologist, C. J. Drake, in a report of the Iowa Departme Agriculture.

It is claimed that these salts prevent flies from bothering An analysis of these salts by state chemist shows that they mostly common salt with the a tion of a small amount of sulp and a slight amount of lime.

"A lot of bogus insecticides also being sold to unsuspecting ple to protect seeds which plant," states E. L. Redfern, chemist. Many of these comp are labeled as required by law tests which have been run by st entomologist C. J. Drake shows tha hey are worthless."

Materials of this kind should be reported to the Iowa Department of Agriculture, Des Moines, Iowa, so that they can be checked up and made to conform to state and federal insecticide laws.

THE AMERICAN LEGION

(Copy for This Department Supplied by the American Legion News Service.)

PADEREWSKI GREAT FRIEND OF LEGION

"The American Legion has no greater friend than Ignace Jan Paderewski," declared John R. McQuigg, national commander of the Legion, recently in pointing out the unusual efforts made by the aging master of the piano in behalf of the Legion's $5,000,000 endowment fund for disabled veterans and orphans of the World war.

The largest individual gift to date to the Legion's endowment fund, $28,487.07, was made by Paderewski. The gift represented the receipts from a series of four concerts at New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Washington. Not only did Paderewski give the entire proceeds of the concerts to the fund, but he also defrayed all the expenses of himself and his large staff.

When President Coolidge, honorary chairman of the Legion's endowment fund, was informed of Paderewski's generous gifts to the fund, he wrote to Commander McQuigg:

"I am extremely gratified that the Paderewski concerts added so materially to the Legion endowment fund, and the thanks of all those interested in this fine cause are due to the pianist and to those who had the matter in charge."

In appreciation of Paderewski's efforts for the endowment fund and in recognition of his distinguished World war record generally, the Legion extended him a special tribute when he appeared in concert recently at Indianapolis, where national headquarters of the Legion is located. When the great Pole arrived at the concert hall he was met at the stage entrance by a Legion committee representing Commander McQuigg. Color bearers stood at either side of the entrance bearing the national and Legion colors. The Legion committee occupied a box suitably decorated. Following the concert a floral tribute in behalf of nearly a million Legionnaires was presented

Following the concert, the Legion expressed to Paderewski the Legion's appreciation for what he had done for the disabled and the orphans of the war. Mr. Paderewski replied:

"I want to express my thanks to the Legion for having been permitted in my small way to show my appreciation for what American soldiers did for honor and service and love of liberty. For you fought not for the Stars and Stripes only, but for the Polish eagle."

Legionnaires Take Jobs of Illinois Policemen

When a large part of the police force of La Grange, Ill., went on strike recently in sympathy with a chief of police who resigned, it seemed that the town would be unprotected until the American Legion came to its rescue.

The trustees of the village met in special session and issued a call for volunteers. Col. W. M. Curtis, commander of the local American Legion post, responded.

Within a few minutes he had a force of twenty-five Legionnaires on the streets to portect the village from any criminals that might take advantage of an unpoliced city.

"The American Legion responded nobly in this crisis," Trustee W. M. Galvin said. "Within a few minutes after part of the police force quit we had Legionnaires patrolling the streets and they stuck to their beats until regular officers could be sworn in."

Son Killed in War; Impostor Is Detected

Rev. and Mrs. Charles Frazier of South Dakota have apparently at last accepted the finding of a federal jury that their son, Arthur, was killed in the World war and buried in a Nebraska cemetery. Through a long controversy they maintained their belief that a man claiming to be their son was really Arthur, even after the jury found that he was an impostor. Advices reaching Minnesota Legionnaires indicate that the couple have applied for federal and state bonuses as beneficiaries of Arthur.

Arithmetic

A benevolent old gentleman (isn't it the darndest how they always crop up in a story?) noticed a small boy burst into tears after he had dropped a dime down a grating.

"Never mind, little man," he comforted. "I'll give you another dime."

"But then," wailed the youngster, bursting into a fresh spasm, "I'd have had twenty cents if I hadn't lost one. Wawawahoo!"—American Legion Weekly.

Noticing a pretty new face in his congregation, the minister was bound to display a cordial interest.

"We are pleased to have you here," he told her politely. "If you will give me your name and address I shall be happy to call."

"Cut it, doc," retorted the flapper, wearily. "I've got a sheik."—American Legion Weekly.

DECLINES BID FROM LEAGUE OF NATIONS

U. S. Will Not Send Envoy to Conference—Will Deal Directly With Nations.

Washington.—President Coolidge will refuse the invitation of the League of Nations to send American delegates to a conference at Geneva in September to discuss our world court reservations with the other forty-eight member states of the court, it was stated authoritatively at the White House.

The President's opinion, as it was outlined, is that the League of Nations has nothing whatever to do with the court and can do nothing with it, even if it wants to. He feels that the only people who can change the court are the forty-eight nations involved, and for that reason this nation will deal with them rather than through any other channel.

While he regarded the invitation as a courtesy, since the United States is interested in the matter, the President does not see any necessity for this government to discuss the reservations at the Geneva meeting.

He feels we should deal with the nations directly concerned.

Geneva, Switzerland.—League of Nations circles expressed astonishment on the receipt of dispatches from Washington saying that the action of the league in sending a circular letter to the members of the world court inviting them to a conference to consider the American reservations had surprised official circles of the American capital.

Officials of the league said that however Washington may have felt about the council's original decision to convoke a conference to discuss the reservations, there can be no justification for surprise over the actual dispatch of the invitations.

These officials explained that the sending out of the circular letter to the court signatories was only routine procedure called for by the decision of the council.

It was added that the sending out of a circular letter is the practice always adopted when the league arranges for international conferences, the differences in this case being that it was sent only to the members of the court and not the members of the league.

Not all the members of the league are members of the court, and the council, it was emphasized, wishes to keep the American reservation question as one entirely the concern of the members of the court.

As was the case in the invitation dispatched by the league to the United States, the league's letter to the court signatories encloses the text of the minutes of the council meeting which adopted the proposal to call the conference.

The most important section of the letter reads as follows:

"The council has decided, in the first place, to propose to all governments which have received from the United States a copy of the senate's resolution 'that replies should be made indicating the difficulty of proceeding by way of a mere exchange of notes and the need of a general agreement.'

"In the second place, the council has decided to invite all the governments signatories of the protocol and the government of the United States to appoint delegations to participate in the discussion contemplated by the above-mentioned recommendation and in the framing of a new agreement at a meeting to be held in Geneva September 1."

Warsaw, Ind.—Four persons are reported to have been killed and twelve injured during a Communist demonstration in the town of Streym in the Carpathians.

WASHINGTON BRIEFS

Owing to the number of witnesses waiting to be heard, no end of the hearings of the house agriculture committee on farm relief proposals is in sight.

A substitute for the Volstead act to prohibit manufacture, sale, importation and exportation of distilled liquors and thus in effect permit beer and wines and other nondistilled beverages has been offered in the house by Representative Carew (Dem., N. Y.).

Flat rejection of a request from Charles E. Hughes, counsel for the American Petroleum Institute, for data collected by the President's oil board was announced by Secretary of the Interior Work, board chairman.

An invitation was taken under consideration by President Coolidge to speak in Chicago, July 14, dedicating a memorial building erected by the Elks. The invitation was extended by a committee of former exalted rulers.

SEE GREAT DANGER FROM MELTING SNOW

Greater Portion of Country Covered—Streams Rise.

Chicago.—From the Rocky mountains to the New England states, snowfalls of varying depth have been the program the past week, and many streams threaten severe damage, some already reported out of their banks. Officials of the weather bureau expressed fear of danger of heavy floods, especially in the Mississippi valley, in event of a quick thaw.

In the region west of Chicago the snowfall was the heaviest on record for this time of the year. Western Illinois reported 21 inches in three days, an all-time record. Roads leading into numerous small towns throughout the state and the entire Midwest have been blocked, and much suffering has resulted from shortage of fuel and food.

At St. Joseph, Mo., a new record was established with a fall of 13 inches; and St. Louis reported that practically all roads in northern Missouri have, for several days, been blocked by high drifts. Sleet and some rain featured the storms which have followed in close succession.

The heavy fall of snow on the eastern slopes of the Rockies in Colorado forced the eastward-bound air-mail planes down at Rock Springs, Wyo. The storm in the far western states reached its worst pitch around Great Falls, Mont., where very cold weather accompanied the snowfall.

While the extreme southern section of the country escaped the fury of the week's blizzards, unusual weather conditions have prevailed in nearly every section.

Governor Davis Denies Part in Boodle Deal

Topeka, Kan.—Testifying in his trial on a charge of bribery, former Gov. Jonathan M. Davis of Kansas declared that his son, Russell Davis, had acted without his knowledge and consent in accepting $1,250 in delivering a pardon to Fred W. Pollman, convicted banker.

The son, who is being tried jointly, had asserted on the stand previously that his father knew nothing of the acceptance of the $1,250. Young Davis said it was a case of taking advantage of an opportunity to make "some easy money"; that he learned by accident that his father was issuing a pardon to Pollman, and that he merely got his father's consent to deliver the document and on this account took the money that Pollman had offered.

To Use Airplanes to Kill Off Mosquitoes

Washington.—Marines stationed at Quantico, Va., plan to fight mosquitoes this summer with airplanes.

Sawdust soaked in water containing arsenic is the new weapon to be used against the pest, and it will be scattered over the creek and swamp lands from airplanes. Experiments have demonstrated its effectiveness against mosquitoes, Commander McLean said, and far from proving harmful to vegetable, fish, fowls or persons, it will serve as a tonic.

Sioux City, Iowa.—Fire practically wiped out the business section of Carter, S. D. The loss was estimated at about $100,000.

U. S. PERMITS SALE OF 3 PER CT. BREW

Two Large Breweries to Make Medicinal Drink—Sold at Drug Stores.

Washington.—Plans of the administration to crush widespread violations of the prohibition laws, embodied in a bill offered in the senate by Senator Goff of West Virginia, propose heavy fines, jail terms and more drastic search and seizure provisions. The measure was accepted at the capitol as the answer of General Andrews to the growing agitation in congress for modification of the Volstead act.

Washington.—Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews, dry czar, has dashed the hopes of the thirsty who expected legal high-power beer as a result of permits granted for sale of 3.75 per cent malt extract.

Supporting the statement made by Prohibition Director James E. Jones, Andrews declared this tonic, containing 25 per cent of solids, "is by no stretch of the imagination a beer."

Officials permitted reliable manufacturers to restore these tonics to the market so they would be available to persons who need them, Andrews said.

If attempts should be made to use them as beer they could instantly be witthdrawn from the market, he added.

Washington.—Permission has been granted by the prohibition division of the bureau of internal revenue to two large breweries to manufacture a malt liquor containing 3.75 per cent alcohol by volume and 25 per cent malt solids, to be sold to the public through drug stores without prescriptions or dealer permits.

The permits, it was learned, were issued on a "six months' trial" during which the brewers are required to "aid" the prohibition division in the prevention of the sale of the malt liquor to the public for "beverage purposes."

Director of Prohibition James E. Jones gave his consent to the new brew after chemists of the bureau of internal revenue had reported that the tonic could not be used as a beverage.

The chief difference between the new tonic and the old was explained. The malt extract contained in it is so high that it would be impossible to take the fluid as a beverage. It could be taken only in small quantities. The output is limited, it was explained, and the manufacture would be far more expensive than that of beer. A twelve-ounce bottle would cost 30 or 40 cents.

The tonic is described as a sort of sweet, sirupy substance of heavy appearance. It is intended for use principally in hospitals and by prescription of physicians, the main purpose being for convalescents. Malt tonics, it was explained, were used to a great extent for medicinal purposes before the Volstead act. Prohibition officials said there seemed to be a real need for something of this kind.

The permits were issued to the two breweries, it was said, after conferences between their representatives and representatives of the government. The permits were issued a fortnight ago and already one company, it was also learned, has written to wholesalers announcing it had been allowed again to manufacture the product with an alcoholic content of 3.5 per cent and a solids content of 25 per cent. In the letter the company wrote that the product would be "palatable, but not potable to an extent that it can be used as a beverage."

The letter said that wholesalers would be permitted to sell the product in quantities of five cases weekly to small druggists and twenty-five cases weekly to large druggists, and added that it "hoped it will not find its way into illegitimate channels."

No official regulation covering the manufacture of the malt liquor, as it is already called, has been issued by the prohibition department, and accordingly, it was said, there are no requirements for dealer permits or bonds to govern its sale.

Prior to prohibition the general run of beers contained from 3 to 6 per cent alcohol by content and 4 to 7 per cent of solids. Bock contained 10.05 per cent solids and 4.53 per cent alcohol, American beer of the lager type was in three classifications—3.48 per cent alcohol and 5.08 per cent solids, 3.56 per cent alcohol and 6.50 per cent solids, and 4.12 per cent alcohol and 7.43 per cent solids.

"Let the World Know" Good Slogan for City

The slogan adopted by the Mobile Bay boosters, "It Can Be Done," is a good one, but it won't give the members of the various committees much time to go fishing while they are putting Mobile on the map as one of the world's principal ports. Blow your own horn is just as true today as when the slogan was first used. Every city in the United States over ten thousand that is growing today has a good brass band. Just as a band is considered as necessary as guns to every regiment in an army, so is a city band necessary to put the enthusiasm into any project you wish to put over. Your docks, harbor improvements, Baldwin bridge, million-dollar high school, and the voting of the library and incinerator bonds, a few of us here in the South know about. But why hide your good works under a bushel? "Tell it to the world." The Websterian definition of the word boom is, a rapid rise in price, a sudden burst of popular favor, to go off with a rush, to push with energy. Atlanta, New Orleans, Omaha, Kansas City, Seattle and Los Angeles are bright examples of prosperous cities that are now building under the direction of booster or boomer clubs, working through their boards of trade or chambers of commerce.

The methods employed by the boomers are all similar in city boosting. For the information of those who are not familiar with booms and boomers as applied to city boosting: The same methods are applied that made household words throughout the nation of popular brands of soaps, chewing gum, cigarettes, shirts and collars and other articles in every day use; also made millionaires of their owners. To be summed up in one word, publicity in its broadest sense is boom tactics.—Mobile Register.

Attractive Door Yard Has Monetary Value

Well planned and properly planted grounds help to make a home.

"No lawn is too small nor too large to be made a place of beauty," says F. A. Aust of the horticulture department at the University of Wisconsin, in a new bulletin on "Planning and Planting Home Grounds."

It is the choice of plants and the manner of arranging them that counts. When certain principles of planting are followed, a picturesque effect results, and the home grounds are a constant delight to the family, as well as to friends, neighbors and passers-by.

"The amount of money required to make the home gardens attractive need not be large," says Aust. A few well-chosen trees, shrubs, and flowers added each year will result in very attractive grounds, and will greatly add to the value of the property.

Good in Zoning Laws

Zoning laws should be taken into account and given careful study by builders. They were made primarily to protect certain districts against certain classes of buildings. Too many of our cities have been hit-and-miss affairs, and it is undoubtedly a sign of the times that zoning regulations have come. In cases where such rules have been in effect for some years, the wisdom of such laws is apparent. Many an excellent residential neighborhood has been killed by the creeping in of some obnoxious commercial enterprise.—Chicago Post.

Watch Trees That Lean

In the care of one's yard caution should be taken against irregular growth of trees and means adopted to rectify any fault in the tree's growth at the start. Many trees are inclined to lean in a certain direction through being forced into that position by prevailing winds from the opposite point, and unless braced while young, it will be impossible for them to grow upright as they should. It is well that a sufficient space be spaded up around the tree, and the ground kept worked and properly fertilized.

Study Child Accounting

In an effort to improve school attendance in Spokane, Wash., 43 principals of schools are taking a special course in child-accounting methods conducted by the city superintendent of schools, following the introduction of a new system of child accounting in the public schools of the city. ROAD BUILDING

SOUTHERN STATES SPEED ROAD WORK

That the southern states are rapidly forging to the front in the construction of new paved motor roads is indicated in reports from the state highway departments of the sixteen states of the South which show that under their direction a total of $170,000,000 is available for new roads this year.

Including the construction work already under way by counties and townships the sums being spent in the South this year for road improvements will aggregate approximately $400,000,000. In the new construction the asphaltic types of pavement predominated and construction this year will outstrip any year heretofore.

In Texas last year $3,800,000 was expended for actual maintenance and $600,000 worth of equipment was purchased. Kentucky built 400 miles of improved highways last year at a cost of $10,000,000 and will expend $7,000,000 this year. South Carolina's last year's program involved the expenditure of $5,000,000 for maintenance and new construction. Approximately $7,000,000 is available for 1926. More than $30,000,000 in road projects are under contract in Missouri and $26,000,000 worth of contracts have been completed.

West Virginia completed last year 658 miles of ronds and 24 bridges at a cost of $15,800,000 and carried over uncompleted projects involving $9,300,000 into this year. Arkansas expended $9,000,000 for new roads last year. Approximately $10,000,000 will be available this year. A 5,000-mile system is maintained by Georgia. Florida in 1924 awarded contracts totaling $4,400,000 and constructed 350 miles of roads. Expenditures for highways last year in Mississippi aggregated $4,550,000.

Contracts awarded in Tennessee last year aggregated $10,500,000 and plans adopted provide for the continuation of construction. Louisiana expended $7,000,000 and completed 600 miles of all-weather highways. This year $8,000,000 is available. North Carolina is steadily advancing its big highway program. In Alabama a total of $13,000,000 of $25,000,000 worth of road bonds have been sold and the remaining $12,000,000 will be put into roads in the year 1926. The Oklahoma state highway department in the first year of its reorganization shows construction under way valued at $10,000,000.

Wisdom of Federal Aid Policy of Government

In view of the question raised in some quarters as to the wisdom of the federal aid policy of the government, here are a few figures that will enable the situation to be viewed from a new angle.

Since 1918 motorists as a class have paid the federal government in the form of excise taxes on automobiles and parts the sum total of $779,385,339. Since the beginning of federal aid in 1917 the government has actually expended $270,305,407 as its share for the construction of federal aid highway projects, according to figures compiled by the Lincoln Highway association.

This means that the government has expended less than 36 per cent of the amount of motor vehicle revenue paid by the motorists as a class into the coffers of the Treasury department. At this rate the government still owes the motorists some $503,079,032. With this balance sheet there can be little doubt that they will line up 17,000,000 strong for continuation of the federal aid policy.

They have already footed the bill.

Types of Road Surfaces

In the commonwealth of Australia and also in France, after trials of various types of road surfaces have been made, asphaltic and bituminous forms of road construction have been adopted. It is a curious feature of asphalt that the bitumen, an essential ingredient, is obtained from crude petroleum from which also is obtained the motor spirit used by the very vehicles whose wheels play a large part in the wear and tear of the roads.

Good Roads Hints

Last year the government gave the states $111,000,000 to help build 11,300 miles of new roads. This is a record. An additional 12,500 miles is being completed.

* * *

The mileage of surface roads in the United States is nearing the 500,000-mile mark. In addition to surfaced roads, a considerable mileage has been graded and drained according to engineering standards.

* * *

More than half the roads of Brazil are suitable to automobile traffic.

* * *

The state highway department plans on eliminating the so-called "dead man's curve" on the Lincoln highway about four miles from Greensburg, Pa., where seven persons have been killed and many injured.

* * *

A census taken by the state highway department shows that the average traffic over the Lincoln highway in Wyoming during the present year was 474 vehicles per day.

NOT A CAKE

This photograph, taken of a bride of the Black forest district of Germany, is very interesting. What looks like a cake is a crown or headdress, 12 inches in diameter and 8 inches high, weighing from 6 to 10 pounds, consisting of 10 rows of glass balls and beads in various colors and sizes, embellished with small mirrors and other glittering ornaments. It is worn by all maidens at festivities such as church, family, christening, wedding and social affairs. Brides wear this from early morning until the church ceremony and wedding dinner and until ten at night, when she dons housewifely garb to show her submission to her husband.

WOMEN OF MIDDLE AGE

Praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Mrs. Annie Kwinski of 526 1st Avenue, Milwaukee, Wis., writes that she became so weak and run-down that she was not able to do her housework. She saw the name Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in the paper and said to her husband, "I will try that medicine and see if it will help me." She says she took six bottles and is feeling much better.

Mrs. Mattie Adams, who lives in Downing Street, Brewton, Ala., writes as follows: "A friend recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and since taking it I feel like a different woman."

With her children grown up, the middle-aged woman finds time to do the things she never had time to do before—read the new books, see the new plays, enjoy her grand-children, take an active part in church and civic affairs. Far from being pushed aside by the younger set, she finds a full, rich life of her own. That is, if her health is good.

RUBBER IN PHILIPPINES

General Leonord A. Wood said in a recent statement: "I am perfectly confident that rubber can be as successfully grown in the Philippines as cocoanuts and will greatly benefit the people. There is no reason to believe Philippine farmers connot grow it as profitably and successfully as the natives of Sumatra and Borneo."

It would be a fine thing if Uncle Samc ould develop his own rubber plantations in the Philippines and so protect us from the great rubber monopoly. But if rubber can be grown there with profit to the natives themselves and to America, this will furnish another reason to [illegible] many of our professional [illegible]rs, why the Filipinos should [illegible] their freedom at once.

[illegible] these are a great many people thinking themselves good citizens, who seem to consider it a crime for Americans to succeed anywhere, especially when their doing well will conflict with the interests of some European nation. They of course want to see the Filipinos do well, but not through American effort, and at the same time to the enhancement of American profit From their point of view the natives would be better off starving to death in "Freedom" than waxing prosperous under American rule, especially if American business interests might be sharing in the prosperity.

AMERICAN SHIPBUILDING

The bureau of navigation of the Department of Commerce reports that on March 1 American shipyards were constructing 227 steel vessels and 46 wooden vessels.

All of these vessels presumably [illegible] employed in the coastwide [illegible] only shipping trade in [illegible]eans can engage with[illegible]oreign competition [illegible] beginning, the coastwise [illegible]as been protected against foreign invasion. This is the reason why such shipping is prosperous. If American ocean shipping could be protected in some way it would soon be as prosperous as the coastwide trade, and American shipbuilders would be busy constructing vessels for the overseas trade.

Free trade on the high seas, or "reciprocity on the ocean," ruined the American merchant marine years ago It has cost the American people many billions to have any ocean merchant marine at all; and is costing them millions now every year, in a hopeless struggle with foreign competitors. The lack of protection of American shipping in competitive ocean commerce is a reproach to the business sense of the United States. — Washington Post

MAKING THE ROAD DOLLARS COUNT

The financial problems solved by the type of roads built in Glenn County, California, is one which shou'd interest other sections of the country containig large rural areas of low assessed valuatio.

Glenn County has a considerable milage of gravel and crushed rock highways which are now being surfaced with asphaltic concrete, as fast as funds are available.

The initial contract for this type of pavement was let for resurfacing the 16-foot Princeton to Butte City [illegible] with three inches of asphaltic [illegible]te, at a cost of approximately [illegible]00 per mile.

[illegible]e old gravel road, used as a [illegible]e for the new pavement, was lightly scarified to grade, sprinkled, and thoroughly rolled until there was no further movement of the sub-grade The hot asphalt mixture was then dumped on this firm foundation, spread and raked into place, and rolled With the addition to the surface of a squeegee coat of hot asphalt and screenings, the new asphaltic concrete pavement was ready for traffic.

In this manner the property owners have secured a durable type of highway for a very moderate cost.

A dollar bill that will wear longer is all well enough, but what we are looking for is one that will spend longer.

The seed catalogs show nice pictures of everything except the backache.

Taking the Profit Out of War

By BERNARD M. BARUCH

Reprinted from The Atlantic Monthly.

[The February issue of the Atlantic for 1925 carried a paper by Mr. Sisley Huddleston dealing with the general subject of "taking the profit out of war," which Mr. Huddleston called "An American Plan for Peace." The first-quoted phrase was put into the language by the War Industries Board toward the close of the World War through its efforts to eliminate all war profits. Mr. Huddleston's article came to the attention of Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, chairman of the War Industries Board and administrator of the non-profit plan, and (as he writes us), since it seemed to indicate a growing interest in the idea, induced him to invoke practical means to bring about a full comprehension of taking the profit out of war in the various great countries of the world To this end he responded to a suggestion by Mr Owen D. Young, of the Page School of International Relations at Johns Hopkins University, that he establish a course of lectures there to expound the War Industries Board plan in detail Later he will proceed to make similar arrangements at leading universities in Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, and Japan. Agreeing with Mr. Baruch that the subject calls for public knowledge and discussion, it was natural for the Atlantic to turn to him for the following paper.—THE EDITORS OF THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY.]

I

War was once described as Prussia's most profitable industry.

It needs only a scant examination of history to learn that other countries were open to the same indictment The methods of the Robber Barons did not pass with the end of feudalism Annexation by conquest did not cease. But when America entered the World War President Wilson fathered a doctrine that shall always govern us—that never a foot of territory would be added to our boundaries by force.

So, as America has taken the lead toward making impossible national profit through war, it too may be America's privilege to point the way toward making impossible individual profit through war. To take the profit out of war is to take a long step toward creating an economic detestation of war. The experience of the United States in the World War affords a basis for the belief that the plan heroin discussed is practical. In fact, it is more than a belief—it is a certainty, although not widely known.

The world is such a busy place, and the radius of human activity has been so greatly enlarged because of modern inventions, that it is not strange that there are but few people who are conversant with what was quietly but effectively taking place in this country in the mobilization and use of its material resources in the World War—a process that would have eventually eliminated all improper profits

Strength is given to the public advocacy of industrial mobilization made by both President Harding and President Coolidge—Mr Coolidge as recently as last October in his Omaha speech to the American Legion—by the fact that the plan they advocated as a part of the regular national war agencies had once been set up and successfully operated under the War Industries Board.

Preceding the President's recent clear exposition of this subject, some degree of public interest had been engendered by an exchange of letters between Owen D. Young (of Dawes plan fame), in behalf of the Walter Hines Page School of International Relations, and the writer. The correspondence resulted in the establishment of lectures at the Page School (of Johns Hopkins University) on this theme Previously the Atlantic Monthly printed an article by Sisley Huddleston, who pointed out that Europe saw great strides toward peace in the American idea of "taking the profit out of war" in a systematic way. His basic reference was to the plan of the War Industries Board.

The resources of a country might be referred to as the five M's: (1) man power; (2) money; (3) maintenance or food; (4) material resources (including raw materials, manufacturing facilities, transportation, fuel and power); and (5) morale The intelligence with which the first four are directed and co-ordinated as a whole will determine the fifth, the morale of the community

In the war emergency it early became evident to those who were charged with the responsibility of mobilizing the resources that there was a just sentiment among the people against profiteering. Profiteering might be willful and profit making might be involuntary; but, whatever its form, there was a just determination it should cease. So it became necessary to fix prices where the supply was limited.

Wherever the government created a shortage by its demands, prices were fixed, not only for the Army, Navy and the Allies, but for the civilian population as well. And in addition to price fixing on war essentials (such as steel, wool, copper, and so forth), the balance, after the war program had been filled, was rationed or distributed according to the priority needs of the various civilian demands. In other words, where the price of the product of an industry was fixed that industry had to deliver the part which tho government did not need to the civilian population, not in the way the industry chose, but as the government directed.

It must be remembered that when the war came there was no adequate preparation. Indeed, it is doubted by the best authorities whether any effective form of preparation then known would have been of much avail in view of the widespread and engulfing results of the war and the lack of knowledge of the various instruments of destruction which were being devised and which it became necessary to combat.

Our own Army had several divisions competing one with another for materials, transportation, housing, and so forth. On top of that there prevailed the demands of the Shipping Board, with the slogan that ships would win the war, and of the Food Administration, with the slogan that food would win the war. Further, there was the Railroad Administration with its need for material and labor, and finally there was the feverish quest for labor and supplies on the part of the munition makers—all competing for labor, money, materials, transportation, fuel, power, and each insisting on the greater importance of its activity. All this while the labor supply was being lessened by the flow of men into the Army.

While an endeavor was being made to bring order out of chaos, the great undertaking had to go on. Men, ships, munitions, food, material, had to be provided. Old organizations, bureaus and traditions had to be met and changed, but not destroyed until the new was set up. The wonder of it all is, not that there were so many mistakes, but that so much was accomplished.

At the time we entered the war prices were at their peak, and tending higher because of the war's insatiable demands. The problem was not alone to secure the materials and labor and to stop the confusion, but to do it in such a way that the morale of the people would be maintained. The prices of some things, like steel and copper, were fixed far below prevailing rates, and the wages of labor in those industries were standardized. The more highly organized an industry, the easier it was to arrange. Order did not commence to appear until the Army funneled its needs through one man sitting with a section of the War Industries Board and until the Navy, Shipping Board, Allies and Railroad Administration did likewise Each department satisfied its requirements through a central authoritative body. This was called the War Industries Board, controlling and directing all materials and co-ordinating through its chairman the whole system of governmental and civilian supply and demand. It was created by executive order in March of the year 1918.

Briefly, this board endeavored to mobilize the industries of America so that the fighting forces of the Allied and associated nations could draw from the United States—the last reservoir of men, materials and money—the things needed for the winning of the war at the time the things were needed and with the least dislocation of industry and the least disturbance of the civilian population.

II

The War Industries Board was organized like any other supervisory committee, with a chairman, vice chairman, members in charge of various activities, bureau chiefs and subordinate workers. It surveyed and sought to arrange the whole industrial war field under the plenary powers conferred by the President and the Congress. How well it did this is a story for others to tell. What it did is the basis of the plan I am here drawing

It was comparatively easy to fix prices and to distribute materials, and indeed to stabilize the wages of labor in those industries in which prices were fixed. The labor situation, however, became increasingly difficult, particularly when General Crowder found it necessary to withdraw men for the proposed campaign of 1919 after 4,000,000 soldiers had already been taken

Much has been said about the profiteering of labor. It is an unjust accusation. It is only fair to say that this condition was primarily brought about through the inexperience of the organization within our own governmental departments and by the furious bidding of munitions makers and ship builders for services. That situation, together with the increased prices of the things that labor had to buy with the results of its work, made it inevitable that labor must get higher wages.

So it became evident that the price fixing program had to go even further, and the War Industries Board, when the Armistice came, was proceeding with a campaign to fix the prices of all the basic things that labor had to buy Some had previously been fixed. I speak of labor in a much broader sense than manual labor, for the unorganized so-called "white collar" part of our community—clerks, teachers, government employees, professional men—were less able to meet the situation than labor in the narrower sense. For the protection and relief of such groups certain plans were devised. To illustrate—

Taking the Profit Out of War

By BERNARD M. BARUCH

Reprinted from The Atlantic Monthly.

One of them provided that manufacturers, jobbers and retailers of shoes could make and sell shoes only of a specified quality, at a fixed price, effective July, 1919. No one who did not have a card of the War Industries Board in his window could sell shoes, and only the standardized shoes could be sold. No jobber or manufacturer would sell shoes to anybody who did not have this card. The shoes were to be stamped Class A, B or C and had to be of the quality prescribed and sold at the price fixed The country was so organized in every district that there could be immediately reported to Washington the name of any shoe retailer who did not carry out the regulations of the War Industries Board as to price and quality Through restrictions on his labor, money, raw materials and transportation no manufacturer would have been permitted to sell to any dealer violating the regulations. The Armistice stopped the execution of this plan.

Another plan of this nature: The manufacturers of men's and women's wearing apparel had in 1918 been called to Washington, together with the retailers of various goods, and notified that regulations would have to be made in regard to retail prices and standardization of clothing.

The rulings by the board were made known through the issuance of official bulletins at irregular intervals and were widely distributed by the press, which co-operated in this most necessary work with a whole-hearted purpose that gave to the orders of the War Industries Board the instant and broad circulation they required.

Mr. Hoover already was doing much to perfect his control of food products and prices. There was also talk of fixing rents, and in some cities this was done.

If we were to start, in the event of another war, at the place where we were industrially when the World War ended, the President, acting through an agency similar to the War Industries Board, would have the right to fix prices of all things as of a date previous to the declaration of war when there was a fair peace time relationship among the various activities of the nation It would be illegal to buy, sell, serve or rent at any other than these prices. Brakes would be applied to every agency of inflation before the hurtful process started. An intelligent control of the flow of men, money and materials would be imposed, instead of having the blind panic heretofore ensuing on the first appearance of the frantic demands of war The Draft Board would have before it the rulings of the priority committee, together with the estimated needs of every business and profession in its relationship to the conduct of the war, and men would be selected accordingly. The Draft Board could more intelligently decide, with the advice of the priority committee many of the problems with which it would be faced. There would be no sending of men to the trenches who were needed for expert industrial war work and then bringing them back again. Businesses not necessary to the winning of the war would be curtailed The Draft Board would have that information before it.

The prices of all things being fixed, the price fixing committee would make any necessary adjustments, as was done during the war. Under the system used in 1918 these prices were made public and adjusted every three months, so that any consumer or producer had his day in court when he considered prices unfair. Those who complained that during the war prices were too high had this ready recourse to hand

In the meantime all the industries of the country would have been mobilized by the formation of committees representative of each industry as was done in the World War. Over them would be placed a government director or commodity chief. The various government departments would appoint committees representing their requirements, so that on one committee the resources of the nation would be represented and on the other the demands of the government. The government director would stand between to decide, in conjunction with the priority committee, to what department supplies should go.

Money would be controlled and directed like any other resource. "Taking the profit out of war" is not synonymous with "conscription of wealth," as it is sometimes regarded. The latter is a theoretical project, prohibited by our Constitution, contrary to the spirit of our social and political institutions, and impossible in practice. Taking the profit out of war is an orderly and scientific development of the economics and conduct of modern war, necessary to the effective mobilization of national resources and indispensable to equalizing the burdens of war among the armed and civilian population Born of experience and proved by practice, it removes some of the most destructive concomitants of modern war—the confusion and waste incident to war time inflation.

This term "conscription of wealth," used by so many, has created a hope among those of socialistic tendencies, and a fear among those who, like me, believe in our system based upon personal initiative and reward, of a taking of money without payment, for the use of State. Neither the hope nor the fear is justified by the recommendation herein contained or by our experience in the war. The use of money should be controlled and directed in a national emergency. A man should no more be permitted to use his money as he wishes than he should be permitted to use the production of his mine, mill or factory except through the general supervising agency. This was being done toward the end of the war.

During the final phase of the World War no man or corporation or institution could raise money without the approval of the Capital Issues Committee of the Treasury Department, which committee in turn would not permit the borrowing of money unless the War Industries Board approved the use to which it was to be put. Thus the City of New York was not permitted to spend $8,000,000 for the building of schools. The City of Philadelphia was prevented from making improvements that in peace time would have been necessary, but in war time were not. Various states, counties and cities, and a vast number of private concerns, were denied the use of money and materials for purposes not necessary for the winning of the war. Each part of the community had to adjust its wants to the whole great undertaking.

III

There have been a great many bills introduced into Congress on the subject of industrial mobilization, some sponsored by great organizations like the American Legion, and others by newspapers and publicists. But it is surprising how little knowledge there was on the part of those who drew up the bills of the practicability and feasibility of so mobilizing our resources that it would be impossible to make as much profit in war as in time of peace. Take into consideration the fact that the following things were being done in 1918:—

General Crowder, who was in charge of the draft, had asked the chairman of the War Industries Board where he could obtain additional men needed for the Army in France with the least possible dislocation of the war making industrial civilian machinery, and we were in the process of replacing male labor with women By a system of priorities the Board was allocating to our own Army and Navy, to the Allies and to the essential war industries the things they required It was making priority rulings as to transportation, and they were being followed out by the Railroad Administrator. The Fuel Administrator distributed fuel only on the rulings of the War Industries Board. The Board was engaged in disentangling and removing the many conflicts and competitive efforts involved in labor and buildings that had previously occurred because of lack of any co-ordinating agency. It was allocating power and making regulations for the hitching up of scattered units of power It was changing munitions orders from congested to less congested districts. It had actually carried into effect an order that no building involving $2,500 or more could be undertaken without the approval of the War Industries Board. No steel, no cement, no material of any kind could be used for any purpose whatsoever unless the War Industries Board permitted it. No steel company could sell over five tons of steel unless approved by the Director of Steel. The Treasury would not permit the raising of money for any industrial or financial operation unless it was approved by the War Industries Board. The President issued an order that no commandeering should be done by the Army, Navy, Shipping Board or Food Administration without the approval of the chairman of the War Industries Board. Every raw material industry, and indeed practically every industry in the country, was organized through appointment of committees, and none of these industries would do any business except under the rulings promulgated by the Board Standardization in every industry was rapidly proceeding These rulings were made known through the issuance of official bulletins at irregular intervals and were distributed by the press. We were endeavoring to arrange it so that the fighting forces were to receive those things which they needed and no more, so that whatever was not actually required at the front was left to civilian purposes. Industries were curtailed, but never destroyed; skeletonized, but never killed. Indeed, the use of men, money and materials was rapidly being brought into exactly that condition which I have previously stated to be necessary in case of another war.

If, in addition to this, the President in the future has the authority to fix prices and distribution of materials and labor, rent, and the use of man power, transportation, fuel and all the things necessary for the conduct of the war, any rise in prices will be prevented, even in anticipation of war. There are many who claim that war is caused primarily by the desire of profit. I am not one of those. But if there is anything in this contention this plan will remove the possibility of anybody urging war as a means of making profits. Even if there are no men who desire war as a means of making profit, the fact that profits would be less in war than in peace, and wealth and resources would be directed by the government, might have some active deterring influence on men of great resources. Instead of being passive, they might become active advocates of peace.

There are many people who are, for various reasons, afraid to discuss the subject during peace time and prefer to wait for war. There are also some great manufacturers who oppose any such plan because they were seriously interfered with during the war time. Indeed, it has been the experience of some of those responsible for the industrial mobilization in the World War to remain the objects of venomous attack begun during the time that the necessities of the nation made it imperative to control activities and profits. Some critics were prominent manufacturers, who said: "Tell us what the government wants and we will fill the orders, but don't interfere with the sale of the part of our product that the government does not want to use." That was unthinkable. President Wilson decreed that fair prices for the government were fair prices for civilians. I must say, however, that the vast majority of American manufacturers rose to the situation in such a splendid way as to bring the following commendation from Woodrow Wilson: "They turned aside from every private interest of their own and devoted the whole of their trained capacity to the tasks that supplied the sinews of the whole great undertaking. The patriotism, the unselfishness, the thorough going devotion and distinguished capacity that marked their toilsome labors day after day, month after month, have made them fit mates and comrades to the men in the trenches and on the seas."

There are many men who are afraid that the adoption of this plan by Congress would give an impetus to socialism or communism or sovietism or whatever they may call it, because they say, "If you show it can be done in war time there will be a demand that it be done in peace time" It cannot be done in peace time. There can be no great undertaking without a strong moving cause. In peace time the moving cause is personal initiative and payment for services performed. The substitute for that in war time is the common danger

The War Industries Board was the foremost advocate of price fixing and distribution, and it had great power in this field, but when the Armistice came it recognized that peace conditions were being restored, and it was the first to change the war time order of things and to leave to the people themselves the readjustment of their affairs I am satisfied that it is impossible for the government to do in peace time what I am advocating, although it becomes absolutely necessary in order to conduct a modern war successfully and to conduct it on a non-profiteering basis.

The application of this plan, besides making the nation a coherent unit in time of war, would impress upon every class in society a sense of its own responsibility in such event. If it were known that this universal responsibility would be enforced, no class—social, financial or industrial—could fail to understand that in case of war it would have to bear its share of the burdens involved and would have to make sacrifices of profit, convenience and personal liberty correlatively with those made by the soldiers in the field. To this extent the plan would act as a positive deterrent to any hasty recourse to force in an international controversy.

One thing that has definitely come from the war is the necessity of arranging affairs so that a portion of the population shall not be sent to the front to bear all the physical hardships and their consequences while others are left behind to profit by their absence If applied at the outbreak, the War Industries Board (as it was functioning at the close of the World War) would prevent this and lessen, if not remove, the social and economic evils that come as the aftermath of war.

A QUEER MAID

SYNOPSIS.—Traveling by canoe on the Mississippi, on his way to Biloxi, in the early days of the settlement of Louisiana, William Brampton, English spy, known to Indians and settlers as the "White Indian," sees a Natchez Indian post a declaration of war against the French. For his own purposes, he hastens to Biloxi to carry the news to Bienville, French governor. Brampton meets an old friend, Joe Labrador, Indian halfbreed, who warns him Bienville has threatened to hang him as a spy. Brampton refuses to turn back. He falls in with Jules and Basile Mattor, on their way to Biloxi to secure wives from a ship, the Maire, bringing women from France. At Biloxi Brampton protects a woman from a sergeant's brutality. She tells him she is Claire Dahlsgaarde, picked up in a raid in Paris. Evidently well bred and educated, she is a mystery to Brampton. He intervenes to prevent a man, English, known as "Old Six Fingers," following her to New Orleans. A Frenchman, Francois Narbonne, slightly demented by stories he has heard of the riches of the New World, introduces himself. Bienville accuses Brampton of treachery, but the latter secures a respite from death by revealing the Natchez declaration of war. He is to await the arrival of a former companion, Damoan the Fox, who will exonerate or condemn him. Damoan has documents proving Brampton an English spy. Brampton receives a message from Claire, begging him to help her reach the English settlements. Brampton trusts Narbonne with a note to Claire promising to meet her at New Orleans. He plans his escape. After a struggle Brampton wrests the incriminating papers from Damoan and escapes from Biloxi. He meets the Mattors and they go to New Orleans in a sailing packet. At the landing place Brampton again encounters Joe Labrador, whom he sends to bring Claire to him. Brampton questions her closely, but she will tell him little of her history. With Labrador, Brampton and Claire leave in two canoes for the English settlements.

"We now come to the great river, the Mississippi. I am positive the man Damoan and his Indians are coming up the river to look for me. I have paddled hard to make the big river ahead of them. Now I am wondering if it is wise to go ahead of them."

"But how can we flee from them unless we be ahead?" she exclaimed.

"If they are ahead and we can follow them I should like it better," I replied.

"Oh, la! La! To think of that!"

And for the moment she was an entirely new and most tantalizing young woman. She laughed softly and with such zest that I was amazed and thrilled.

"Oh, monsieur! Now I do feel safe when you can plan so shrewdly," she cried. "To be sure! They seek us ahead of them, their eyes are all to the front, and we come softly after them, like a mouse walking after the cat! The big river? Pooh! I will not be afraid of it any more."

"How old are you?" I shot over my shoulder.

"Nineteen. Twenty in December," she promptly replied.

"Have you paused to think what people may say when they are told you traveled with me from the Mississippi to the coast?"

Her grave eyes stared at me in deep perplexity, and I could have kicked myself for putting the question.

"What will they say?" she slowly repeated, with a little frown wrinkling her brows. "Certainly they will say Monsieur Brampton is a most kind and compassionate gentleman to help a poor girl find a place of safety."

I was glad to be out of it thus easily, and to prevent her taking time to analyze the query and arrive at a more world-wise conclusion, I spoke of Six Fingers. Her face reflected terror, and she whispered:

"That man is the devil, or the devil's man! It is because of him that I wear this."

And from her blouse she pulled a small dirk in a sheath and secured by a string around her slim neck.

"He bothered you in New Orleans?"

"The French gentleman, the one who gave me your note and who went away before I could thank him, kept very close to the bad one. But I do not think the bad one wished to talk with me in New Orleans. However, he will follow me if he can."

"But what has he to do with you? How long have you known him?"

"Known him, monsieur?" she gasped, eying me in amazement. "One does not know such cattle."

As she finished the scarlet of confusion suffused her face, and she turned her head and said:

"He did not bother me on the ship. But over here, in this country, if a man is strong and has a black heart—"

"And has been a pirate," I suggested.

"Yes, yes! He has been a pirate! Terrible stories he told on the voyage over! He has done monstrous things. He is still a pirate in his evil heart!"

This perfervid explanation deceived me none. She had not thought of him as a pirate until I gave her the idea. And what righteous indignation when I assumed she had known him in the past! It was all most bewildering. My estimates of her had ranged from a guttersnipe to a fine lady; from a street gamin to a refined and worldly-ignorant child. If appearances and speech went for anything, she possessed the hauteur of the lady and the ignorance of the child. If her conflicting stories of how she came to be on the Maire, her obvious poverty, and her useless hands were to be considered, there could remain only the bateful conclusion that she was a product of the streets, and that life had been horribly unfair to her.

"We land here, mademoiselle," I announced, drawing up to the bank. "The river is just ahead. I must ask you to stay here while I look about a bit."

"Stay here alone?" she exclaimed, glancing about as if expecting to find danger in her innocent surroundings.

"You will be safe. I would not leave you if there was any danger. Here is my pistol. If you feel very much afraid you can fire it."

"It is all so strange, you will have the good heart to excuse. I do not care for the weapon. Go."

This was delivered with the poise and composure of a mature woman. And yet when I reached the bend and stole a backward glance and saw her standing where I had left her, her hands clasped before her, her head bent in mournful attitude, she became a child again. I suddenly was loath to leave her there disconsolate, thinking she might be frightened during my absence.

I pushed forward rapidly, and at last stood on the shore of the Mississippi. I stood for a moment looking across its broad expanse, then I was on my hands and knees among the bushes, watching two pirogues turning the bend below. The one ahead was large and filled with Indians. In the second were three men, two of whom were white men. I hastily retreated a considerable distance.

Secure in my new position, I waited for the pirogues to cross my line of vision; and as I watched I was startled by a light step behind me. Wheeling apprehensively, I was in time to detect a slight motion in the bushes. I crawled toward the bushes to investigate, but before I could reach them Mademoiselle Dahlsgaarde stepped into view; into view, also of anyone on the river passing the Iberville. I grabbed one of her be-legginged ankles and yanked her to the ground and glared savagely as she would have opened her mouth to scream. Then toward the Mississippi I turned to learn the worst.

The Choctaws were gazing upstream. None was looking in our direction. But in the other canoe one of the white men was touching the Indian on the shoulder. The Indian ceased paddling and stood up and peered under his hand toward our hiding-place. Then he dropped on his knees and resumed paddling. The white man, who had been suspicious, gesticulated with the other white man, who gazed toward our hiding place, then sank back.

His companion, not yet satisfied, stood up and fed his hawklike gaze on the thick growth; hawklike, because he was Damoan the Fox. And he thought he had seen something. His companion wore a blanket over his shoulders and had his hat pulled low, and I could not make out his features. The Fox reluctantly resumed his paddling, but so long as the Iberville was in sight he looked back.

The two pirogues passed from view. I remained motionless for some twenty minutes, waiting to see if they were playing a ruse, and, after making us believe they had gone, would be stealing back to surprise us. At last I was satisfied that Damoan at the most had caught only a suggestion of motion from the corner of his eye. Doubtless he decided it was some animal. I rose and returned to reproach mademoiselle for her indiscretion. What I saw held me tongue-tied. It was an entirely new phase of her. Rage flamed in her eyes like war-beacons. Her breath came fast and furious, and the ivory of her race was stained a vivid scarlet. She was glaring at me like a madwoman, and the small dirk was drawn back for a drive.

"You canaille!" this amazing creature hissed at me, as I stood there with my mouth open, like an expiring fish. "You dare lay a hand on me in anger! Don't lie! I read your eyes. You were angry and you dared lay a hand on me while so base!"

I could only think of a panther's whelp, spitting and clawing. She was such a tiny tornado that I must have smiled a trifle. Certainly there was something in my face that caused her to leap forward. Then I was ashamed of myself, and felt only pity for her. I dropped my arms to my side and awaited her pleasure. She pressed close, her gaze baleful and vengeful, meeting mine squarely. Just as I believed she was going to strike she staggered back with a wild little cry, dropped the weapon and sank on her knees and hid her face in her hands.

It was horribly pathetic; and I wished Joe Labrador, or any other thick-headed voyageur could have been there to give me some of the kicks I felt I deserved.

I scooped her up and stood her on her feet, replaced the dirk in the sheath outside the blouse, and patting her awkwardly on the shoulder said:

"There, there, child. I am sorry."

With her hands still pressed to her face she managed to repeat:

"You laid a hand on me in anger!"

"I'm sorry," I simply reiterated. "We creatures of the woods lose all sense of fineness. We are crude. My only thought was that the Fox would see you; then we would be hard put to escape him and his Choctaws. I meant well."

She turned and walked back to the pirogue, her braids over her shoulders and hanging down in front like an Indian woman's. In truth, I had been extremely provoked at her blunder; and I feared my grip on her small ankle had been unconsciously severe.

"That Man Is the Devil, or the Devil's Man! It Is Because of Him I Wear This."

I watched her as she walked away with small head bowed to see if she limped, and I rejoiced when she showed no signs of hurt from her rough tumble. And what a fine-spun, sensitive nature! With perhaps her life in peril she took exception to my mode of preserving it. Autocracy implies superiority.

On what did she base her autocratic resentment of my style of making her duck from view of Damoan the Fox? This little forlorn sparrow from the streets of Paris—it all was completely beyond me. And yet the pain at having caused her grief was none the less poignant. Taking my time I also returned to the pirogue, and seated myself apart from her and lighted my pipe.

"Why do we not proceed?" she asked without looking at me.

"Damoan and his red butchers must be given time to draw ahead," I told her.

"I think, Monsieur Brampton, you had best take me back to the Bayou St. Jean, where I can make my way to la Nouvelle Orleans. If that be too much bother, hollow a log like this and I will make my own way. Or a raft."

I was most careful to maintain my gravity as I listened to her absurd request. I took some time to think it over, apparently. Then I gently replied:

"You are your own mistress. I only wish you to act wisely. If you really desire to go back of course I will take you. Do you care to tell me your reason for returning? Is it because you cannot trust yourself longer to my protection?

My question worked the last effect I could have desired. It reduced her to humility. Her transition from the tone of the grande dame afire with indignation to that of a girl humbly supplicant made me feel like a zany. She was kneeling before me and stretching up her small hands and, like a penitent child, begging me to overlook her behavior.

"For God's sake, don't!" I cried in English, catching her wrists and pulling her to her feet.

"But—I raised—raised a mortal weapon—against you," she sobbed.

Luckily my impulse to ridicule the tiny dirk was checked in time to permit my expression of gravity to remain.

"It was but your way of showing resentment," I said soothingly. "It was perfectly natural. One does not like to be mauled about unless one knows it's for one's own best good. Now that you know that, it is as if it never happened. You are nervous, Mademoiselle Dahlsgaarde. You are not yourself. You have suffered much mentally. Let us say no more about it. It is nothing after one has slept and rested. So, shall we fare north again? It is not wise to let our pursuers get too far ahead."

Without a word she entered the pirogue and seated herself on the blankets. I placed my musket in the bow, ready for my hand, and paddled slowly around the last bend, my eyes impatient to search the upper reaches of the river. There was no sign of the two pirogues.

"Monsieur Brampton," she softly said as I drove the pirogue against the bank to allow her to land while I dragged it through the shallows into the great river; "I can go no farther until I know the truth."

Here was an enigma cropping out of this small bundle of puzzles.

"Mademoiselle, I listen," I politely told her.

She stood with one foot on the side of the canoe, waiting for me to speak before she would even step ashore. "I must know I'm forgiven—that your heart holds no resentment against me," she said.

I resisted a temptation to dismiss the matter lightly, as that was sure to embroil us in further misunderstandings. It would have been more simple if she would remain on one plane, that of child, or woman. So I made my mien very serious as I stood there holding her hand, and earnestly declared:

"There was never anything to forgive. But if you must have it so, then you are forgiven. I have never held resentment against you and never can. Now do you believe me?"

The sudden radiance of her face astounded me. One would have thought I had granted her some rare boon. She bobbed her head in place of words and sprang ashore. I waded through the shallows, pretending not to observe her fight for self-control, and prolonged the task of dragging the log canoe through the ripples. At last I had the pirogue in deep water, and she, quite composed, took her place and I swung into the river.

There was no sign of Damoan and his companions ahead. As the sun was now close to the western forest crown I began to fear they had gone into camp and that I might be approaching too close. We had been passing through the territory of the Bayogoulas and had not seen an Indian. I suspected that the war threatened by the Natchez had sent the hunters back to their temples to make new medicine to the Opossum, their chief deity, before joining with the Choctaws as allies of the French.

If the Choctaws came into the fight then their hereditary enemies, the fierce Chickasaws, would stand by the English; and Sieur de Bienville would find the fighting not to his liking. I said nothing about Indians to the girl as I made for the high bank; and she, simple one, assumed it was natural for none of the aborigines to frequent the river.

"Why do we go ashore?" she whispered over my shoulder, as if fearing the river would overhear us and betray our presence.

"To camp for the night, mademoiselle. The darkness will rush quickly through this lane in the forest. Here we have high ground and good water."

I got the canoe ashore and helped her out and packed the blankets and musket and smoked beef up the bluff. While she sat under a tall tree, with her braids over her shoulders, I gathered bark and made her a shelter with the opening toward the spot where I would build the fire. I knew of a spring back a bit from the bluff, and from this I procured a gourd of water. Then I gathered dry wood and started a small blaze and instructed her how to feed it so we would have a bed of coals for cooking our supper. Then, taking a hook and line, I informed her she was perfectly safe and that I would soon return from trying for a fish in the river.

I lighted the fire and descended to the river without having spoken a word. For twenty minutes I patiently sought my fish without success. In straightening up I was surprised to behold her slim form on a log behind me.

"You here!" I exclaimed. "But I thought you were to remain and feed the fire?"

"I did not care for the loneliness, monsieur," she calmly informed me.

Her disregard of my wishes—in my mind I called it orders—annoyed me. However, I managed to smile and remind her:

"We will have lost much time in making coals for broiling the fish."

Evidently the girl will get the fugitives into trouble, for they are undoubtedly pursued.

Masterpieces Lost to World Through Flames

The world is very much poorer today because so much classical literature of the early centuries has been lost.

Aeschylus is said to have written from 70 to 90 dramas, but only seven, in a complete state, have been handed down to us. Only seven, too, of the 120 tragedies written by Sophocles are known, with, perhaps, 100 fragments of the others. Of the dramatic works of Euripides, which are said to have totaled 92, only 17 tragedies and a play, dealing with satyrs, also a few fragments of the other compositions, now remain. These losses, also of Greek lyrical works, are due to the destruction by fire of the two great libraries of Alexandria in 47 B. C., when the city was besiged by Julius Caesar. In this fire 700,000 volumes were destroyed.

Is your car a General Motors Car?

IF YOU own a Chevrolet, a Pontiac, an Oldsmobile, an Oakland, a Buick or a Cadillac, you own a General Motors car.

"But what," you may ask, "does that mean to me?" It means just this:

General Motors is a family of companies building motor cars and trucks and such other famous automotive products as Fisher Bodies, Delco and Remy electrical systems, Harrison radiators and AC spark plugs. Still other General Motors products are Delco-Light electric power plants and Frigidaire electric refrigerators. There are General Motors plants in 44 cities, employing 120,000 people; and sales and service organizations in 144 countries.

General Motors uses the combined resources of this great family for the benefit of each member. It effects great savings in the purchase of quality materials; it provides the best of engineering talent; it maintains the world's largest research laboratories and proving ground for automobiles; and it assures the permanence of its various divisions and the products which they make.

In other words, General Motors has every facility and every incentive to maintain quality and to offer value for the price; and the current models of General Motors cars are offered as the greatest values in the history of the automobile industry.

Than youth itself, though in another dress,
And as the evening twilight fades away,
The sky is filled with stars, invisible by day."

FOOD FOR THE FAMILY

For those who like the old-fashioned buttermilk soup, the following will be enjoyed:

Mulled Buttermilk—Take five cupfuls of buttermilk, stir a tablespoonful of flour into a little of the buttermilk, add and cook until boiling hot. Season with cinnamon, sugar or nutmeg.

Kidney Beans With Sour Cream.—Cook the beans until tender, then add sour cream to moisten thoroughly. Place over a slow fire and simmer one hour. Add salt and pepper to taste.

Orange and Water Cress Salad.—Arrange a nice bed of water cress on a salad plate, arrange overlapping slices of orange and serve with French dressing. Very nice to serve with game.

Baked Onions and Cheese.—Parboil half a dozen medium-sized onions until nearly tender. Drain and put them into a baking dish, then cover with a layer of white sauce and a sprinkling of good snappy cheese, repeat and finish the top with a layer of buttered crumbs. Bake in a hot oven until the crumbs are brown.

Brown Nut Bread.—Take two cupfuls of graham flour, one cupful of wheat flour, one-half cupful of molasses, one tablespoonful of sugar, one teaspoonful of soda, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one cupful of raisins, and one and one-half cupfuls of walnut meats. Mix and bake in a moderate oven.

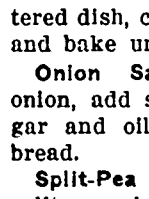
Mock Crab.—Melt four tablespoonfuls of butter, add one-half cupful of flour, one and one-half teaspoonfuls of salt, three-fourths of a teaspoonful of mustard, one-fourth teaspoonful of paprika. When well blended pour in gradually while stirring constantly, one and one-half cupfuls of scalded milk. Bring to the boiling point and add one can of cornlet, one egg lightly beaten, three teaspoonfuls of worcestershire sauce. Turn into a buttered dish, cover with buttered crumbs and bake until brown.

Onion Sandwich.—Chop a small onion, add salt, pepper, a little vinegar and oil and spread on buttered bread.

Split-Pea Soup.—Soak a cupful of split peas in two quarts of water. In the morning put the peas over the fire with a ham bone or piece of salt pork, a slice of onion, and simmer for four hours. Rub through a sieve, return to the fire; melt two tablespoonfuls of butter, add two of flour, mix well and add a little soup to the consistency of pouring. Stir into the soup and cook five to ten minutes. Season with salt, pepper and add one cupful of thin cream just at serving time.

Timely Dishes.

A good salad is always appreciated and a good salad is one which is dressed with a tasty dressing.



Lettuce With Egg Salad.—Put crisp head lettuce cut into quarters on salad plates after being well chilled in cold water and drained. Take hard-cooked eggs and put the yolks through a ricer; chop the whites very fine. Pour highly seasoned French dressing over the lettuce and sprinkle with the whites and yolks. This makes a pretty salad to carry out the color scheme of yellow.

Pear Salad.—Set half a canned pear on a few heart leaves of lettuce. Sprinkle with a few cubes of Neufchatel cheese and half as many strips of pimento. Take one cupful of double cream, two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice, four tablespoonfuls of the pear sirup, one-fourth of a teaspoonful of salt and four tablespoonfuls of honey. Beat the dressing until light and pour over the salad.

Caramel Cornstarch Pudding.—Take two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch, mix and cook with one pint of milk. Put three-fourths of a cupful of brown sugar in a smooth frying pan, melt and stir until dissolved and a golden brown, then add the boiling hot cornstarch mixture. Stir until all the sugar is well blended with the pudding, add a pinch of salt and serve in sherbet cups with whipped cream.

Cinnamon Rolls.—Take two cupfuls of light bread dough, add one-half cupful of sugar, four tablespoonfuls of shortening, cut in the mixture until well blended. Roll out, using flour to handle, then spread with butter, sprinkle with sugar and cinnamon, roll up and cut into small rings. Place to rise on a baking sheet; dust with brown sugar just before baking.

Spring Salad.—Slice crisp red radishes very thin, add sliced green onions and a little chopped green pepper. Serve on lettuce with a mayonnaise dressing.

Tomatoes and tomato juice are invaluable aids in the diet of young or old. Use the fresh tomatoes, canned, or the juice—all good for children.

Dishes made chiefly from milk, fish, meat, poultry and eggs with meat substitutes form the most important group in a well-balanced ration. Then come cereals, breads, fats, of which butter is the most important.

COLOR IMPORTANT IN TOPCOAT; FOR THE BIG AND LITTLE GIRL

IT IS good to be living in the present day, when one can wear, in the name of fashion, colors as bright and joyous as the tints of the rainbow. Such a season for color as is this! Even our cloth topcoats, which once we thought must appear in tone as neutral as shy pussywillows in springtime, now take on color.

Indeed color is playing a role so vastly important that it all but counts more than the actual styling of the garment. It is a fact, a garment may be fashioned most simply, free from any novel detailing, yet if it registers an important new shade, its style significance is pronounced at a glance.

Green is one of the leading color themes for cloth this season, especially soft-toned shades. Even the tans have lost all somberness, as they take on a touch of rose. Then there are the rose tones themselves which have been so assertive among Palm Beach colorings and which bid fair to repeat their vogue throughout spring and summer modes. As to navy and gray, they are pre-eminently smart colorings of coats, hats or frocks.

No less fascinating than the coloring of our spring coats, are the materials from which they are made. There is an impressive air of refinement about the exquisitely textured woolens featured throughout all fashion's realm. Emphasized among leading fabrics are twills, reps and wool bengalines.

Inspired by choice fabrics of perfect coloring, the stylist is making it a point to carry the thought of superior workmanship and careful detailing into the moderate-priced coat as well as the more costly types. The coat in the picture may be in almost any coloring of one's choosing. Fine twill is the medium chosen for its development. Its outstanding detail when it comes to its styling is that extra fullness has been acquired by introducing a subtle flare at the side seams in conjunction with a pointed waistline brought from the back to under the arms. Thus has genius adopted the flare without sacrificing the slim silhouette which is as popular as ever. The majority of simple cloth coats are collared with dainty spring fur, as is true of the model in the picture.

In all clothes for youngsters, beginning with the little tots and going on to those of the sub deb, one sees repeated, or reflected, the style points that were first presented for grownups. Evidently spring's new modes became the inspiration of those designers who occupy themselves with the needs of the younger generation. They have not even omitted the note of greater elaboration in spring styles and so little missy is going to be somewhat less simply dressed than she has been. This is true, at any rate, of her dressup and party frocks.

When taffeta came rustling in, the makers of children's clothes pounced upon it for nothing is better suited to youthful wearers. It is used alone and in combinations of many sorts, with other materials, for pretty dresses and party frocks for the little miss. It is particularly well adapted to making self trimmings—as ruffles, ruches and shirrings or puffs. The little frock pictured is an illustration, in which puffs of taffeta, shirred over a cord at each edge, form a trimming for the dress. It is easily fashioned into rosettes and flower forms. This simple and pretty frock has a belt of ribbon and little flowers made of it set at intervals along the puffs.

The jumper mode is developed in dressy frocks, with skirts of finely plaited georgette or other light materials, and worn with blouses of gay printed silk that harmonize in color. The combination of georgette and other fabrics is prettily worked out in dresses with skirts of the georgette trimmed with a lattice work of silk or wool fabric, joined to a long bodice of the same fabric with a georgette vest. Gay and pleasing colors are chosen for little girls' party frocks.

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 83

A Child's Laxative Which Mothers Can Rely On

To Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, it seemed cruel that so many constipated infants and children had to be kept "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

While he knew that constipation was the cause of nearly all children's little ills, he constantly advised mothers to give only a harmless laxative which would help to establish natural bowel "regularity."

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin mothers have a regulating laxative which they can depend upon whenever a child is constipated, bilious, feverish or sick from a cold, indigestion or sour stomach. All children love its pleasant taste.

Buy a large 60-cent bottle at any store that sells medicine and just see for yourself how perfectly it cleanses and regulates the bowels of infants and children.

. T. A. SPELLING BEE HELD AT LAST MEETING

e Word "Separate" Proved Down- fall of Many Spellers

The spelling contest last week at e P. T. A. program was won by e adults. Of the 25 words, over lf (12) of the 19 adults spelled of them correctly. Four adults pelled all of the words. While half our pupils in grades 6-8 spelled t 17 or more correctly. Our 8th rade pupils excelled the adults' re- ord as 4 of the 6 who spelled, spell- d 23 or more of the words correct- y. The other two spelled 18 cor- ectly, while there were six adults ho spelled less than 18 correctly.

Ethel Barz of our sixth grade pelled 23 of the words, while one f our pupils in the seventh grade pelled but seven.

The word "separate, proved to be he spelling demon. Fourteen adults went down on this word while ten pupils failed to spell it. The word "courteous" proved difficult for ten adults and eight of them stumbled on the word "schedule."

Get out the old spelling book and practice up; we may spell again.

TWENTY BILLION POUNDS OF MEAT CONSUMED ANNUALLY

Iowa Furnishes Largest Number Of Hogs And Ranks Second With Cattle

"People of the United States consume 20,000,000,000 pounds of meat annually," stated C A. Cushman, manager of the South Omaha plant of Swift and Company at the annual conference of the inspectors of the Iowa Department of Agriculture.

"This is equivalent to practically 3,000 carloads of meat per day," said Mr. Cushman. "To supply this market 6,500,000 farmers of the country annually market over 100,000,000 animals 14,000,000 of these are cattle, 9,000,000 calves, 16,000,000 sheep and 63,000,000 hogs.

"Iowa is very prominent in supplying these animals. She supplies the largest number of hogs and is second only to Texas in the number of cattle"

BUMPER FRUIT CROP IN SIGHT

Practically all tree fruits went through the winter in good shape according to reports received by R S. Herrick, Secretary of the Iowa Horticultural Society, from correspondents in various parts of the state It is even expected that peaches may be fair to good crop unless injured later in the season.

There is a possibility of a slight injury to young thrifty trees from the heavy freeze in October In many cases the bark is cracked but the chances are good for recovery Fruit trees generally are covered with fruit buds.

The cold weather has delayed development this spring. This is usually a favorable condition Reports from the Iowa Fruit Growers Association shows a large amount of interest in spraying This will improve the quality of the fruit and will also make better exhibits at the Mid-West Horticulural Exposition held at Des Moines, November 16th to 20th.

Want Missouri Bridged Between The Cities Of Omaha and Sioux City

There is not a vehicle bridge across the Missouri river between Sioux City and Omaha With the development of highways since the automobiles came upon the scene this makes a large demand for facilities to cross from Iowa into Nebraska without having to traverse such distances. In order to improve traffic arrangements an attempt is being made to have a bridge constructed across the Missouri river near Onawa There is an excellent bank on the Nebraska side, and the Iowa side is not prohibitive. When the Lincoln highway reaches Denison it takes an abrupt turn southwesterly to Council Bluffs and thence across the river to Omaha With a bridge at Onawa the Lincoln highway would cross the river at this point and thus shorten the distance westward toward the Rocky Mountains at least 100 miles. Gov. Hammill has been asked to lend assistance of his high office to the promotion of the interstate improvement.

DANIEL STECK IS NOW THE JUNIOR SENATOR FOR IA.

DANIEL STECK WINS SEAT IN SENATE AFTER LONG FIGHT

Brookhart Is Ousted By Margin Of Four Votes After Senate Fight Of A Week

WASHINGTON, April 13.—Daniel F. Steck, democrat, is the senator from Iowa—not Smith W. Brookhart, republican insurgent opponent of administration policies and supporter of the La Follette-Wheeler ticket in the last election.

The senate so decided late yesterday by a margin of four votes, 16 republicans joining 29 democrats in supporting the elections committee report recommending the unseating of Mr. Brookhart, who has held the place for one-third of the term, while nine democrats, 31 republicans and one farmer-labor member opposed this action.

As one result of the outcome of the contest, which was bitterly fought through the elections committee, and during the last week, on the floor of the senate, the approaching republican primary in Iowa will be the medium for a fight of exceptional interest, with Mr. Brookhart opposing the remaining republican senator from Iowa, Albert B. Cummins, who has supported administration policies for the nomination.

Steck Is Sworn In

Steck was immediately sworn in, being escorted to the rostrum by Senator Cummins.

Brookhart was not present.

Vice President Dawes administered the oath of office to the new senator, who raised his right hand and in a clear voice declared, "I do." The vice president then shook hands with him, and Steck signed the roll.

Senator Cummins escorted his new colleague to the rear of the senate chamber, where he was congratulated by various senators. Within five minutes after he had been sworn in Steck voted on a roll call. He voted in favor of a motion of Senator Harrison to recess until Wednesday, offered as a substitute for a proposal by Senator Smoot to recess until tomorrow.

"I want your daughter's hand," said the lover, falteringly.

"Well, go down into the kitchen and you'll find it in the dish-water," replied the heartless father. "But, I say," he called after the young man, "can you support a family?"

"Certainly."

"Then get to work, for there's thirteen of us."

GAME PRESERVE BEING PLANNED AT IOWA FALLS

Iowa River Above And Below Iowa Falls Will Be Set Aside For Game Preserve

IOWA FALLS, April 15.—Agitation has been started looking to the establishment of a state game preserve along the Iowa River for several miles above and below Iowa Falls. This movement has been given an impetus by the fact that on Lake Foster, and other parts of the Iowa River where deep water has been created by the new hydro-electric dam of the Central States Electric Company, much wild game has been seen this spring. Ducks of many kinds unknown here have been on the lake and river for several weeks. Muskrats and other fur-bearing animals that are protected by law have been attracted here and it is hoped by the lovers of wild animal life to induce the state to establish a game preserve here with a view to encouraging fowls and wild animals to find a home here free from molestation by poachers.

MANY DUCKS IN IOWA THIS YEAR

Game Warden J. A. Lang, of Algona, is authority for the statement that there are more wild ducks in the counry this spring than he has seen in twenty years. Lakes and streams, he states, are crowded with the birds, and if they choose the same route going back next fall, there will be extra good hunting. Many game wardens are stationed at different points over the state now to prevent hunting during the present closed season.

Police Hold Farmer

Twin City police arrested and held without charges Allen Robinson of the Gerled neighborhood, one evening last week when he was found in that city with $1,275.00 on his person They immediately wired Ralph Johnson, the local constable, of the fact, who reported to them by telephone that Mr. Robinson was an innocent Bancroft farmer, on which advice Mr. Robinson was released and permitted to go on his way rejoicing. He was accompanied on the trip by young Lloyd, of Ledyard, both of whom were held until indentified by Mr. Johnson. The Twin City police no doubt thought that the two young men were bank robbers and were taking no chances with anyone who had so much money. Both were glad to be back in Iowa once more where a roll does not create so much disturbance.—Bancroft Register.

The next meeting will be held at the A. C. Carpenter home in Goodell.

HUMBOLDT ELECTS WOMAN FOR MAYOR

Mrs. Mary Johnson was elected mayor of Humboldt at the recent city election. Great interest was displayed in the election and an unusually large vote was cast. The women of the town took an active part and worked hard to get out a full vote. Mrs. Johnson received almost twice as many votes as her opponent, Mr. Beckwell.

Creameries Saved Clayton

Chief among reasons ... is the only county in Iowa not had a bank failure during late period of financial trouble is the steady stream of cash that has been coming into the different communities from the sales of butterfat produced on dairy farms. County Agent Roy Combs said in a recent interview. The state department of Agriculture recently gave out figures showing Clayton county is in first place in Iowa for production of dairy products, with butter made last year reaching a value of more than $2.000,000. There are seventeen creameries in that county, of which two are owned by stock companies and one by an individual. The others are co-operative creameries owned by farmers.

This is another good reason why it pays to patronize the home creamery.

Fewer Grade Crossings

Two hundred and fifty-nine rail road crossings were eliminated in the construction of Federal aid roads in 1925, bringing the total elimination to 1,380, according to the Bureau of Public Roads of the U. S. Department of Agriculture. This is the result of the policy of eliminating grade crossings wherever practicable adopted by the bureau and eight hundred and seventy-four of the eliminations have been made by relocating highways so as to avoid crossings while the remainder have been eliminated by underpasses and overhead crossings.

Automobiles Responsible For 261 Fatalities In Iowa In 1925

The 662,000 automobiles registered in Iowa last year represented a valuation of $530,000,000. This year the number of cars and valuation will be greater. Automobiles accounted for 261 Iowa deaths in 1925. This figure is 30 per cent greater than the previous year's number of fatalities.

LABOR WANTS BEER; CITES HOME SALOON

Workingman in Strong Appeal Before Senate Investigating Committee.

Washington.—With the war cry: "2.75 per cent beer versus sour slop," the American working man appeared before the United States senate's prohibition investigating committee with these demands:

"Legalization of beer of 2.75 per cent alcoholic content and wine of from 10 to 18 per cent alcoholic content.

"No return to the saloon.

"No repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"A chance to vote on modification of the national prohibition law."

Labor's spokesmen uttering those demands represented officially 4,000,000 members of the American Federation of Labor, who with their families make an aggregate labor union population of 24,000,000.

Demands were accompanied by vigorous declarations on conditions created by efforts to enforce the Volstead act.

Outstanding declarations of that nature were:

"The most serious danger confronting the republic is that we are becoming a whisky drinking people.

"The present state of affairs must be improved upon or it will result in chaos.

"Ninety per cent of the working men are making wines, beer and such decoctions in the home out of every known fruit and vegetable. They are even making wine out of parsnips.

"The average working man feels that the Volstead act only benefits two classes. One is the fanatic who wants to reform and regulate everything by law, and the other is the bootlegger.

"Ninety-five per cent of the men of labor are opposed to the Volstead act in its present form and believe that it is unenforceable."

Labor's antiliquor declaration was equally emphatic. It reads:

"There seems to be a disposition to represent organized labor as in favor of bringing back the saloon. We want to make it clear that there would be no stronger opponent of bringing back the saloon than organized labor."

The main trend of arguments and of pleas for beer, the arguments for light wines being swamped so to speak, by this statement made by President William J. McSorley, speaking for one million members of the building trades department of the American Federation of Labor:

"Among working people you don't hear the cry, 'We want wine,' but 'Give us beer and we will be satisfied.'"

Mr. McSorley added:

"Restore beer, and 10 per cent of the working men might still want hard liquor, but 90 per cent would be satisfied.

"Let the working man get his beer and it will eliminate bootleg whisky and eliminate raisin jack and home brew, which in the end is nothing but a lot of sour slop."

The federation officials seemed to feel no doubt that modification of the national prohibition act is coming, for their appeal for a national referendum on its modification was worded thus:

"Give the people a chance to vote on the prohibition question, for in the light of new knowledge there will be no doubt of a result."

GREAT OIL BLAZES PERIL 2,000 HOMES

Loss Estimated at $7,000,000; 28 Missing in Ship Blasts.

Los Angeles, Cal.—The great oil fire at the Union Oil company tank farm in San Luis Obispo, 200 miles north of here, has burned out, while on the same company's storage area at Brea, 20 miles south of Los Angeles, the second huge oil blaze was a seething menace to that settlement of 2,000 people.

Five of the burning reservoirs at San Luis Obispo, where lightning started the blaze, and a dozen smaller surface tanks also have burned out while six or seven others of this size remain intact.

Revised estimates of oil loss here placed the aggregate at approximately 5,000,000 barrels, valued at about $7,000,000. The equipment loss was not estimated. The death list stood at two, A. E. and W. F. Seeber, father and son.

At Brea three reservoirs of a total capacity of 2,500,000 barrels burned, while the overflow from these, also aflame, had crept to within an eighth of a mile of the edge of the town.

The total financial loss at Brea is fixed in the neighborhood of $3,000,000.

Luling, Texas.—Struck by lightning, a 55,000 barrel oil storage tank on the Magnolia farm, a mile from here, burned. Magnolia Petroleum company employees, shooting holes in the tank, succeeded in draining off most of the oil.

New Orleans, La.—Grounded in the Mississippi river about forty-five miles below New Orleans, the Dutch tanker Stanvac which was rocked by explosions after it collided with the Standard Oil tank steamer Thomas E. Wheeler, was burned. Scores of several tugs bravely battled the flames, which are believed to have caused the death of twenty-three sailors.

Searchers sought the bodies of five men officially missing since a series of explosions occurred here aboard the O. T. Maring, another Standard Oil tanker. Adolph M. Johnson of New Orleans, an electrician, died in a hospital here of injuries received in this disaster. Forty-five others were suffering from injuries.

Senate Committee 10-2 for Rail Merger Bill

Washington.—The senate interstate commerce committee, by a vote of 10 to 2, reported favorably on the Cummins compulsory railroad consolidation bill. The measure provides that American railroads be given a five-year term in which to arrange voluntary mergers under approval of the interstate commerce commission, and that at the end of the specified term the commissioners be empowered to compel consolidation. The bill, which has the endorsement of the Coolidge administration, has as its object the fusing of the country's railways into a few great systems.

NO LEAGUE FOR US, ASSERTS COOLID

Delivers Significant Pronouncement on Entrance Into World Court.

Washington.—Addressing the journalists of the American continent after laying the corner stone of the National Press club's $[illegible] newspaper office building and club quarters, President Coolidge delivered significant pronouncement on the entrance of the United States into the World court.

The reservations adopted by the senate, in voting to adhere to the World court protocol, will operate, his opinion, not only to safeguard the interests of the United States but also to create an independent tribunal of international justice which will cease to be subservient to the League of Nations.

Previously the President addressed the Pan-American congress of journalists, dwelling on the duties and opportunities of the press in the western hemisphere to bring the peoples of the two continents into closer acquaintance and relationship.

In his address at the corner-stone laying the President, bespeaking the aid of the press in maintaining harmonious international relations, said that in adhering to the World court the American government had been animated by a desire to promote the peaceful settlement of international disputes.

"This has been done," he went on, "under reservations which adequately safeguard American rights and also tend to strengthen the independence of the court."

This utterance and other passages on the World court instantly focused the attention of the politicians and of the Latin-American newspapermen, who, with the members of the cabinet and other high officials took part in the corner-stone laying.

That the President intended the declaration for European as well as American ears is not doubted, the League of Nations having called a conference of World court nations to pass on the American reservations and the President having declined to send a delegate to that conference.

Now he virtually tells the League of Nations that if they reject or [illegible] conditions of adherence to the court they refuse to make the court an independent and more effective instrument for the preservation of peace. He serves notice in effect that unless our terms are accepted we shall be content to stay out of the court.

The President also explained more incisively than ever before why we go into the court but refused to go into the league.

Holds Huerta's Acts Binding Upon Nation

Washington.—The general claims commission of the United States and Mexico announced that any obligations entered into by the "spurious" government of Huerta" are binding upon the present Mexican government. The commission held that Huerta was an usurper; that he held the reins of government by force; that his power was illegal and that he was not a constitutional President of the republic. His routine acts, even under an illegal administration were, however, binding upon the nation. The commission further ruled that Huerta's nonrecognition by America and the warning to American citizens against him did not affect American rights in Mexico or Mexico's liability with respect to the United States' claims. In the case of the Illinois Central's suit to recover the $1,807,531 balance due on 910 locomotives sold the National Railways of Mexico, the commission overruled the motion to dismiss the case.

Ex-Gov. Davis, Cleared, May Seek Office Again

Topeka, Kan.—Cleared of all charges of attempting to sell pardons and paroles while he was governor of Kansas, Jonathan M. Davis refused to say definitely whether he would seek that office again in further vindication of his name. He had indicated previously, however, that he would be a candidate for governor in the fall election.

A district court jury acquitted the former governor and his son, Russell, of a charge of accepting $1,250 from Fred W. Pollman, a convicted forger, for a pardon. Last fall Davis was freed on a charge of conspiring with Carl Peterson, former state bank commissioner, to solicit a bribe from Walter Grundy, a defaulting banker.

MANY LINERS TO CARRY VETERANS

Embarkation details for the 1927 convention of the American Legion in Paris have been announced by the France convention travel committee of the Legion in the form of a map which has provoked wide comment among the thousands of Legionnaires who anticipate going to France in 1927.

The map tells at a glance how 30,000 veterans of the World war will be loaded aboard twenty-four liners at seven American ports in the greatest peace-time pilgrimage in the history of the world. It also shows exactly how much it will cost for a round trip ticket from the capitals of each of the forty-eight states to the different ports of embarkation assigned the states.

Prepared under the direction of the France convention travel committee, the map involved months of consultation with representatives of the seven steamship lines commissioned to transport the army of veterans back to France and with representatives of all the principal railroads in America.

It shows that from the port of New York the delegations of twenty states will embark for France, approximately 32,000 men, said to be a single passenger embarkation larger than ever before sailed out of New York harbor. These will be carried on the ships of five lines.

The states going out of New York represent a wide belt, stretching across the continent from California and Oregon to New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

Montreal is the northernmost port indicated on the map for the embarkation of Legionnaires. From it will sail the delegations of the seven northern states along the Canadian border from Washington to Michigan.

Bowman Elder.

Boston will embark six New England states. From Hampton Roads will go Legionnaires from five middle southern states, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee and North Carolina, and the District of Columbia. Charleston, S. C., will be responsible for the embarkation of five southern states, from Arkansas on the west to South Carolina on the east. Florida is the only state which will have the distinction of its own exclusive embarkation port, Florida Legionnaires embarking from Jacksonville. The three southwestern states of Arizona, New Mexico and Texas will board liners for Europe at either Houston or Galveston, Texas, while one of the ships from Texas will call at New Orleans to pick up Louisiana Legionnaires.

In making the assignments, the committee in charge has made an effort to save Legionnaires as much time and money as possible, according to Bowman Elder, of Indianapolis, the chairman of the committee. In practically every case the port selected is the one most cheaply and quickly reached from the states assigned to it.

"This embarkation information is being announced so far in advance of the convention," Mr. Elder declared, "in order that it may assist Legionnaires who want to go to calculate exactly how much will be required for the trip and how much time will be necessary, so that they may provide both sufficient funds and sufficient vacation in 1927."

According to John J. Wicker, Jr., of Richmond, Va., more than 400 Legion savings clubs have been established in banks all over the country, receiving deposits at the rate of more than $100,000 a week, through which Legionnaires of moderate means expect to save sufficient to make the trip in 1927. It has been estimated that the smallest amount for which the trip can be made is $300, though the minimum steamship rate with accommodation and transportation in France has been calculated at about $175.

When Peace Is Necessary

"You seem to be awfully sweet with Marvin, lately," remarked Lucille.

"Yes," answered Lois, sighing. "If we quarrel he might ask for his ring back, and I can't get it out of pawn till Saturday."—The American Legion Weekly.

When the north wind taps my casement,
And the fields are bare and brown;
When out from the sullen leaden sky
Stray snowflakes flutter down,
What care I then for the shadows,
That the roads are deep in the mire!
I've a comrade true in my home tonight—
'Tis the light of my open fire.

FOODS FOR OCCASIONS

The following recipes are, like leisure, "a pleasant garment, but not fit for constant wear."

Sweetbreads With Orange Sauce.—Cover sweetbreads with ice cold water, adding a tablespoonful of vinegar. Let stand an hour, then parboil twenty minutes. Cut into cubes and brown in butter. Serve in the following sauce: One cupful of brown stock, thickened with two tablespoonfuls each of flour and butter and add one-half tablespoonful of finely grated yellow rind of an orange with a tablespoonful of the juice and one tablespoonful of orange marmalade. Let cook all together until boiling, then pour over the sweetbreads.

Currant Jelly Sauce for Game.—Slice one onion and cook in three tablespoonfuls of butter until just brown. Add two tablespoonfuls of flour, one bay leaf, a sprig of celery and stir until smooth. Add one pint of good seasoned stock, simmer twenty minutes, strain, skim off the fat, add one-half cupful of currant jelly and stir over the fire until melted.

Chicken Fillets.—Remove the fillets carefully from the breast of the fowl, sprinkle with salt and pepper and a dash of cayenne. Dip in olive oil and cook in a hot pan until a delicate brown. Add to the pan one cupful of equal parts of cream and white stock. When hot, thicken with two tablespoonfuls of flour rubbed to a paste with an equal quantity of cream. Stir until the sauce boils, then add one-half cupful of thinly sliced almonds.

Panned Chicken With Corn Fritters.—Joint a young chicken and put to roast, pour over a cupful of broth and let cook an hour and a half, basting every ten minutes. When tender, remove the chicken which has been well seasoned while cooking. Prepare a well browned sauce and serve with a garnish of corn fritters around the chicken on a hot platter.

For the Convalescent.

Easily digested food should be served those who are recovering from illnesses. Food should be attractive as well as nourishing.

Egg Soup.—Separate the yolk and white of a fresh egg and beat each. Add three drops of lemon juice and a tablespoonful of sugar to the yolk, then fold in the beaten white. Pour over the egg mixture one cupful of hot milk, beating while pouring. Flavor with a bit of nutmeg or orange juice and add a pinch of salt.

Prune Whip.—Stew half a dozen large prunes in the water in which they were soaked over night. Put them through a sieve, add a few drops of lemon juice and the beaten white of the egg. Serve heaped in a pretty glass, topped with whipped cream.

Baked Apple.—Remove the cores from nice tart apples and fill the cavities with chopped raisins or dates and sugar. Currant jelly may be used in place of the fruit. Bake in a moderate oven until tender. Serve on a pretty plate garnished with a flower.

Rice Pudding.—As rice when well cooked is easy of digestion, it makes a very good dish for the invalid. Take two tablespoonfuls of well washed rice and cook in a double boiler with one cupful of milk until the rice is tender. Stir in a beaten egg, sugar to taste, salt and flavoring. Serve with cream and sugar, or add chopped dates and butter, while hot.

Pineapple Pudding.—Place a cupful of boiling water in a double boiler. Add a tablespoonful of sugar, the yolk of an egg and a teaspoonful of cornstarch. Stir and cook until the starch is well cooked, then add a half cupful of pineapple juice or grated pineapple. Cook until hot, then fold in the stiffly beaten egg white and chill. Heap in a pretty dish and garnish with whipped cream.

Lobster Canape.—Fry one tablespoonful of minced onion in two tablespoonfuls of butter until it is a golden brown; then add two tablespoonfuls of chopped watercress, one tablespoonful of flour, one-eighth teaspoonful of curry powder and one cupful of cream. When the sauce is smooth and of the right consistency, add to it one pint of minced lobster and heat thoroughly. Heap the mixture on rounds of bread which have been sauted in butter until a golden brown. Serve hot.

Eggs and Dried Beef.—Chop fine one cupful of dried beef. Melt two tablespoonfuls of sweet fat in an omelet pan, add the chopped meat and three-fourths of a cupful of strained tomato, a teaspoonful of scraped onion, one-half teaspoonful of salt, then add three lightly beaten eggs and cook, stirring cream throughout. Serve on buttered toast.

WINSOME SPRING MILLINERY; ELEGANT TAILORED MODES

THE dominating note in spring styles is their extreme femininity, apparent, among other things, in the return to favor of taffeta, the vogue for dainty accessories of lace and lacy materials, and especially in the new millinery modes. After a season of small felt hats, so uniform in type and so generally worn as to become tiresome, spring finds us reveling in headwear entirely different and so greatly varied that everyone can be suited and pleased. Silk and straw hats, adorned with ribbons and flowers and millinery ornaments, and shapes that include many draped and brimmed models, make up a world of fascinating new millinery.

There is more dignity and restraint in the tailored modes for spring than has distinguished our street clothes for some time past. It is dignity coupled with dainty and pretty touches and restraint that does not go far enough to be severe. The three-piece tailored suit returns, to find a warm welcome and many charming accessories, to be worn with it. The blouse is important and is chosen with reference to the suit to add to its attractiveness. The small scarf stands ready to contribute vivacity and hats make a climax full of interest, to the elegant tailored modes. But often the use of light, spring-time colors, in the suit or tailored frock, makes it independent of outside help.

Hats Accent Feminine Note.

There are many wide-brimmed styles awaiting the arrival of summer days and the wearing of summer frocks. The small hats, which are liked for general wear, are even more varied in styles—some of the featured shapes are shown in the group pictured here, which starts out with a small brimmed hat of straw with wide collar of silk, embroidered in the Chinese manner and edged with a narrow metallic braid. Millinery trimmings seem to turn to the right this season and this pretty model is finished with handsome rosette of ribbon at the right near the back. Just below it is one of those pretty draped affairs which one runs across so often in the displays, made of silk, satin or ribbon. It has a novelty collar and a handsome ornament at the right side. The small hat at the right is considerably like its predecessor, the little felt, and is one of those popular grosgrain models "in the felt manner" for people who are wedded to little close-fitting shapes. Below it is a charming silk hat, with upturned brim edged with a double flange of malines and caught up by a handsome ornament. Soft straw makes the small and simple hat that finishes the group, with an embroidered motif for adornment, at the front.

One of the outstanding style points in the modes popular for street wear is their softness. Many combinations of silk and straw are collapsible and might be conveniently carried in a suitcase. The all-silk or ribbon hat is adapted to this character of millinery and is usually finished with beautifully tailored ribbon ornaments, or a decorative pin, and there are many examples of the popular black.

A Smart Tailored Frock.

The tailored frock shown here may be imagined in light green or apricot, or other cheerful color. The diagonal weave of the cloth and a silky sheen play into the hands of the designer, who would make a simple and elegant tailored frock, without any furbelows. It is made with a narrow skirt, and a long tunic arranged in inverted plaits below the belt. All the seams are carefully mitered. There is a shallow yoke and turnover collar faced with crepe de chine. Made in dark colors it would be worn with one of the new lingerie collar and vestee sets, to give it a touch of spring freshness.

In the regulation three-piece suits, made of plain cloth, hair-line stripes and novelty weaves, the blouse often matches the suit in color, but has touches of high color and metallic effects in its trimming and collar. Necks are high, with straight or turn over collars and skirts usually introduce plaits in some way. There is no regulation skirt length. The young girls wear them as short as they please, but the older women consider first becomingness and are privileged to wear the length that suits them best.

He Was a Nugget-Seeker

By MARTHA M. WILLIAMS

(Copyright.)

"GO! GO to—Halifax! Anywhere out of my sight!" Myrtle stormed.

Drury, her young sister, laughed teasingly as she flung back: "Thanky! But Minge Junction is plenty bad enough. Whatever made you camp in it, Sis Flower?"

"Shut up! Let me think!" Myrtle hissed through set teeth.

Drury had the money—rather her guardian did. The pair were half-sisters. Myrtle, exquisitely dark, slender and graceful as her name flower, with the accentings of velvet-dark eyes and red-coral lips, fiery, selfish, dominant, was ill-cast in the role of dependent. Drury was fat, but not placid. A shrewd bargainer, she was relentless in keeping bargains once made. Her mother, grandchild of plain hill folk, had mysteriously inherited a half million. It had bought her a husband, in the person of a renowned yet fascinating spendthrift.

When she was killed in a runaway accident two years later cynics said one to another: "The luck of Drury Greer!" He had been left very handsomely provided for—with only that lump of a baby, named for him, as the fly in the ointment.

Drury inherited all her mother's longing for power and high place. At ten, when her father died, leaving Myrtle scant tangible assets, she had driven her first bargain. Myrtle was to stay on, keeping the home up to Greer level, until Drury, properly trained and polished, had been launched socially and put in the way of making a brilliant marriage—this in return for a life of easy luxury.

Child that she was, Drury had realized this was her only chance. She had no background—all her mother's people were dead. Luckily—in a way. The money bought her only a sort of shamed tolerance from the Greers. All that is, but Myrtle—who albeit she stormed and raved sometimes, stood loyally to her promise despite the protests of Greers, and Lacys, her mother's kindred. Her heart had for two years belonged absolutely to one Elliot Lane, a masterful person, restive at waiting longer for his love.

It was this that had moved Myrtle to the desperate venture of Minge Junction—a place she had been told where money counted for everything. At home folk were barely civil to Drury now just turned seventeen. Despite the long bickerings, the stormy outbreaks, Myrtle had somewhat of sisterly love for the lone creature. Until she saw her in the way of being safely married she could not feel that she had a right to her own happiness.

They had come a day back to the gorgeous hotel. But as yet they themselves had not been seen. Raymond Carr, Esq., stood as a lion in the path. He was a sort of human Blue Book, knowing all about everything, everybody, all the nice points of usage. Why, Oh! Why had Fate sent him here? Myrtle had met him casually in her first winter out. He had declined to keep up the acquaintance, telling her hostess: "She is too beautiful—unless she had the million." Poor, fat, free-spoken Drury would be fair game for him.

Drury had vanished. Myrtle sat pondering a quick vanishing by the night train. She started to ring up the office and say so, but sat down almost fainting at what she saw through the open balcony window. Drury, bareheaded, standing mighty straight, facing Raymond Carr. He was smiling down at her—as he rarely had smiled at anything feminine. She had given him the thrill of his life—in blue linen, her broad cheeks richly pink, her clear blue eyes dancing, sandy tendrils clinging to her white forehead, she was an adorable milkmaid. To his dismay he had heard himself asking her: "Would you like a spin to the lake this morning?" And had been answered brightly: "Too late. Mister Man. Sis Flower wrote for a car as well as rooms. I'm sorry—real sorry she did."

She left him no time for debate, running on: "If the hotel car turns out to be just ordinary, won't you please see that we have a better one. please see that we have a better one."

"I shall see to it that you get it," Carr returned smiling broadly. "Even though I'm only a guest—like yourself."

"Oh! Mercy me! And I took you for a livery man," Drury interrupted, her cheeks true scarlet.

"Let's not spoil things by apologies," he said, touching her arm lightly. "No—don't tell me your name—I want to find it out for myself."

"I'd rather tell you—maybe you won't want to ask—when you hear it," Drury said humbly. "I'm Drury Greer. You—you must know all about me."

She was infinitely appealing—even to a human Blue Book. Raymond Carr took her hand, saying with a dazed smile: "Suppose we go find Sis Flower and ask her to chaperone us for a ride."

"You—you aren't fooling!" she asked breathlessly. He looked her full in the face, questioning: "Why should I be?"

"Oh! Because—because nobody ever before seemed to like me," Drury said huskily. "A girl at school said I'd never get a husband, unless he was hunting for gold nuggets."

"I am just that sort," Carr answered, trying to speak lightly. 'But please to remember—there is more than one sort of gold."

"What hast done?" eagerly inquired the company.

LABOR WANTS BEER; CITES HOME SALOON

Workingman in Strong Appeal Before Senate Investigating Committee.

Washington.—With the war cry: "2.75 per cent beer versus sour slop," the American working man appeared before the United States senate's prohibition investigating committee with these demands:

"Legalization of beer of 2.75 per cent alcoholic content and wine of from 10 to 18 per cent alcoholic content.

"No return to the saloon.

"No repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"A chance to vote on modification of the national prohibition law."

Labor's spokesmen uttering those demands represented officially 4,000,000 members of the American Federation of Labor, who with their families make an aggregate labor union population of 24,000,000.

Demands were accompanied by vigorous declarations on conditions created by efforts to enforce the Volstead act.

Outstanding declarations of that nature were:

"The most serious danger confronting the republic is that we are becoming a whisky drinking people.

"The present state of affairs must be improved upon or it will result in chaos.

"Ninety per cent of the working men are making wines, beer and such decoctions in the home out of every known fruit and vegetable. They are even making wine out of parsnips.

"The average working man feels that the Volstead act only benefits two classes. One is the fanatic who wants to reform and regulate everything by law, and the other is the bootlegger.

"Ninety-five per cent of the men of labor are opposed to the Volstead act in its present form and believe that it is unenforceable."

Labor's antisaloon declaration was equally emphatic. It reads:

"There seems to be a disposition to represent organized labor as in favor of bringing back the saloon. We want to make it clear that there would be no stronger opponent of bringing back the saloon than organized labor."

The main trend of arguments and of pleas for beer, the arguments for light wines being swamped, so to speak, by this statement made by President William J. McSorley, speaking for one million members of the building trades department of the American Federation of Labor:

"Among working people you don't hear the cry, 'We want wine,' but 'Give us beer and we will be satisfied.'"

Mr. McSorley added:

"Restore beer, and 10 per cent of the working men might still want hard liquor, but 90 per cent would be satisfied.

"Let the working man get his beer and it will minimize bootleg whisky and eliminate raisin jack and home brew, which, in the end, is nothing but a lot of sour slop."

The federation officials seemed to feel no doubt that modification of the national prohibition act is coming, for their appeal for a national referendum on its modification was worded thus:

"Give the people a chance to vote on the modification question, for in the light of new knowledge there will be no doubt of a result."

GREAT OIL BLAZES PERIL 2,000 HOMES

Loss Estimated at $7,000,000; 28 Missing in Ship Blasts.

Los Angeles, Cal.—The great oil fire at the Union Oil company tank farm in San Luis Obispo, 200 miles north of here, has burned out, while on the same company's storage area at Brea, 20 miles south of Los Angeles, the second huge oil blaze was a seething menace to that settlement of 2,000 homes.

Five of the flaming reservoirs at San Luis Obispo, where lightning started the blaze, and a dozen smaller surface tanks also have burned out while six or seven others of this size remain intact.

Revised estimates of oil loss here placed the aggregate at approximately 5,000,000 barrels, valued at about $7,000,000. The equipment loss was not estimated. The death list stood at two, A. H. and W. F. Seeber, father and son.

At Brea three reservoirs of a total capacity of 2,500,000 barrels burned, while the overflow from these, also aflame, had crept to within an eighth of a mile of the edge of the town.

The total financial loss at Brea is fixed in the neighborhood of $3,000,000.

Luling, Texas.—Struck by lightning, a 55,000 barrel oil storage tank on the Magnolia farm, a mile from here, burned. Magnolia Petroleum company employees, shooting holes in the tank, succeeded in draining off most of the oil.

New Orleans, La.—Grounded in the Mississippi river about forty-five miles below New Orleans, the Dutch tanker Silvanus which was rocked by explosions after it collided with the Standard Oil tank steamer Thomas H. Wheeler, was burned. Seamen of several tugs bravely battled the flames, which are believed to have caused the death of twenty-three sailors.

Searchers sought the bodies of five men officially missing since a series of explosions occurred here aboard the O. T. Maring, another Standard Oil tanker. Adolph M. Johnson of New Orleans, an electrician, died in a hospital here of injuries received in this disaster. Forty-five others were suffering from injuries.

The bill, which has the endorsation of the Coolidge administration, has as its object the fusing of the country's railways into a few great systems.

MANY LINERS TO CARRY VETERANS

Embarkation details for the 1927 convention of the American Legion in Paris have been announced by the France convention travel committee of the Legion in the form of a map which has provoked wide comment among the thousands of Legionnaires who anticipato going to France in 1927.

The map tells at a glance how 30,000 veterans of the World war will be loaded aboard twenty-four liners at seven American ports in the greatest peace-time pilgrimage in the history of the world. It also shows exactly how much it will cost for a round trip ticket from the capitals of each of the forty-eight states to the different ports of embarkation assigned the states.

Prepared under the direction of the France convention travel committee, the map involved months of consultation with representatives of the seven steamship lines commissioned to transport the army of veterans back to France and with representatives of all the principal railroads in America.

It shows that from the port of New York the delegations of twenty states will embark for France, approximately 12,000 men, said to be a single passenger embarkation larger than ever before sailed out of New York harbor. These will be carried on the ships of five lines.

The states going out of New York represent a wide belt, stretching across the continent from California and Oregon to New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

Montreal is the northernmost port indicated on the map for the embarkation of Legionnaires. From it will sail the delegations of the seven northern states along the Canadian border from Washington to Michigan.

Bowman Elder.

Boston will embark six New England states. From Hampton Roads will go Legionnaires from five middle southern states, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee and North Carolina, and the District of Columbia. Charleston, S. C., will be responsible for the embarkation of five southern states, from Arkansas on the west to South Carolina on the east. Florida is the only state which will have the distinction of its own exclusive embarkation port, Florida Legionnaires embarking from Jacksonville. The three southwestern states of Arizona, New Mexico and Texas will board liners for Europe at either Houston or Galveston, Texas, while one of the ships from Texas will call at New Orleans to pick up Louisiana Legionnaires.

In making the assignments, the committee in charge has made an effort to save Legionnaires as much time and money as possible, according to Bowman Elder, of Indianapolis, the chairman of the committee. In practically every case the port selected is the one most cheaply and quickly reached from the states assigned to it.

"This embarkation information is being announced so far in advance of the convention," Mr. Elder declared, "in order that it may assist Legionnaires who want to go to calculate exactly how much will be required for the trip and how much time will be necessary, so that they may provide both sufficient funds and sufficient vacation in 1927."

According to John J. Wicker, Jr., of Richmond, Va., more than 400 Legion savings clubs have been established in banks all over the country, receiving deposits at the rate of more than $100,000 a week, through which Legionnaires of moderate means expect to save sufficient to make the trip in 1927. It has been estimated that the smallest amount for which the trip can be made is $300, though the minimum steamship rate with accommodation and transportation in France has been calculated at about $175.

When Peace Is Necessary

"Yes," answered Lois, sighing. "If a quarrel he might ask for his ring back, and I can't get it out of pawn till Saturday."—The American Legion Weekly.

When the north wind taps my casement,
And the fields are bare and brown;
When out from the sullen leaden sky
Stray snowflakes flutter down,
What care I then for the shadows,
That the roads are deep in the mire!
I've a comrade true in my home tonight—
'Tis the light of my open fire.

FOODS FOR OCCASIONS

The following recipes are, like leisure, "a pleasant garment, but not fit for constant wear."

Sweetbreads With Orange Sauce.—Cover sweetbreads with ice cold water, adding a tablespoonful of vinegar. Let stand an hour, then parboil twenty minutes. Cut into cubes and brown in butter. Serve in the following sauce: One cupful of brown stock, thickened with two tablespoonfuls each of flour and butter and add one-half tablespoonful of finely grated yellow rind of an orange with a tablespoonful of the juice and one tablespoonful of orange marmalade. Let cook all together until boiling, then pour over the sweetbreads.

Currant Jelly Sauce for Game.—Slice one onion and cook in three tablespoonfuls of butter until just brown. Add two tablespoonfuls of flour, one bay leaf, a sprig of celery and stir until smooth. Add one pint of good seasoned stock, simmer twenty minutes, strain, skim off the fat, add one-half cupful of currant jelly and stir over the fire until melted.

Chicken Fillets.—Remove the fillets carefully from the breast of the fowl, sprinkle with salt and pepper and a dash of cayenne. Dip in olive oil and cook in a hot pan until a delicate brown. Add to the pan one cupful of equal parts of cream and white stock. When hot, thicken with two tablespoonfuls of flour rubbed to a paste with an equal quantity of cream. Stir until the sauce boils, then add one-half cupful of thinly sliced almonds.

Panned Chicken With Corn Fritters.—Joint a young chicken and put to roast, pour over a cupful of broth and let cook an hour and a half, basting every ten minutes. When tender, remove the chicken which has been well seasoned while cooking. Prepare a well browned sauce and serve with a garnish of corn fritters around the chicken on a hot platter.

For the Convalescent.

Easily digested food should be served those who are recovering from illnesses. Food should be attractive as well as nourishing.

Egg Soup.—Separate the yolk and white of a fresh egg and beat each. Add three drops of lemon juice and a tablespoonful of sugar to the yolk, then fold in the beaten white. Pour over the egg mixture one cupful of hot milk, beating while pouring. Flavor with a bit of nutmeg or orange juice and add a pinch of salt.

Prune Whip.—Stew half a dozen large prunes in the water in which they were soaked over night. Put them through a sieve, add a few drops of lemon juice and the beaten white of the egg. Serve heaped in a pretty glass, topped with whipped cream.

Baked Apple.—Remove the cores from nice tart apples and fill the cavities with chopped raisins or dates and sugar. Currant jelly may be used in place of the fruit. Bake in a moderate oven until tender. Serve on a pretty plate garnished with a flower.

Rice Pudding.—As rice when well cooked is easy of digestion, it makes a very good dish for the invalid. Take two tablespoonfuls of well washed rice and cook in a double boiler with one cupful of milk until the rice is tender. Stir in a beaten egg, sugar to taste, salt and flavoring. Serve with cream and sugar, or add chopped dates and butter, while hot.

Pineapple Pudding.—Place a cupful of boiling water in a double boiler. Add a tablespoonful of sugar, the yolk of an egg and a teaspoonful of cornstarch. Stir and cook until the starch is well cooked, then add a half cupful of pineapple juice or grated pineapple. Cook until hot, then fold in the stiffly beaten egg white and chill. Heap in a pretty dish and garnish with whipped cream.

Lobster Canape.—Fry one tablespoonful of minced onion in two tablespoonfuls of butter until it is a golden brown; then add two tablespoonfuls of chopped watercress, one tablespoonful of flour, one-eighth teaspoonful of curry powder and one cupful of cream. When the sauce is smooth and of the right consistency, add to it one pint of minced lobster and heat thoroughly. Heap the mixture on rounds of bread which have been sauted in butter until a golden brown. Serve hot.

Eggs and Dried Beef.—Chop fine one cupful of dried beef. Melt two tablespoonfuls of sweet fat in an omelet pan, add the chopped meat and three-fourths of a cupful of strained tomato, a teaspoonful of scraped onion, one-half teaspoonful of salt, then add three lightly beaten eggs and cook, stirring cream throughout. Serve on buttered toast.

WINSOME SPRING MILLINERY; ELEGANT TAILORED MODES

THE dominating note in spring styles is their extreme femininity, apparent, among other things, in the return to favor of taffeta, the vogue for dainty accessories of lace and lacy materials, and especially in the new millinery modes. After a season of small felt hats, so uniform in type and so generally worn as to become tiresome, spring finds us reveling in headwear entirely different and so greatly varied that everyone can be suited and pleased. Silk and straw hats, adorned with ribbons and flowers and millinery ornaments, and shapes that include many draped and brimmed models, make up a world of fascinating new millinery.

There are many wide-brimmed styles awaiting the arrival of summer days and the wearing of summer frocks. The small hats, which are liked for general wear, are even more varied in styles—some of the featured shapes are shown in the group pictured here, which starts out with a small brimmed hat of straw with wide collar of silk, embroidered in the Chinese manner and edged with a narrow metallic braid. Millinery trimmings seem to turn to the right this season and this pretty model is finished with handsome rosette of ribbon at the right near the back. Just below it is one of those pretty draped affairs which one runs across so often in the displays, made of silk, satin or ribbon. It has a novelty collar and a handsome ornament at the right side. The small hat at the right is considerably like its predecessor, the little felt, and is one of those popular grosgrain models "in the felt manner" for people who are wedded to little close-fitting shapes. Below it is a charming silk hat, with upturned brim edged with a double flange of malines and caught up by a handsome ornament. Soft straw makes the small and simple hat that finishes the group, with an embroidered motif for adornment, at the front.

One of the outstanding style points in the modes popular for street wear is their softness. Many combinations of silk and straw are collapsible and might be conveniently carried in a suitcase. The all-silk or ribbon hat is adapted to this character of millinery and is usually finished with beautifully tailored ribbon ornaments, or a decorative pin, and there are many examples of the popular black.

There is more dignity and restraint in the tailored modes for spring than has distinguished our street clothes for some time past. It is dignity coupled with dainty and pretty touches and restraint that does not go far enough to be severe. The three-piece tailored suit returns, to find a warm welcome and many charming accessories, to be worn with it. The blouse is important and is chosen with reference to the suit to add to its attractiveness. The small scarf stands ready to contribute vivacity and hats make a climax full of interest, to the elegant tailored modes. But often the use of light, spring-time colors, in the suit or tailored frock, makes it independent of outside help.

For instance, the smart, tailored frock shown here may be imagined in light green or apricot, or other cheerful color. The diagonal weave of the cloth and a silky sheen play into the hands of the designer, who would make a simple and elegant tailored frock, without any furbelows. It is made with a narrow skirt, and a long tunic arranged in inverted plaits below the belt. All the seams are carefully mitered. There is a shallow yoke and turnover collar faced with crepe de chine. Made in dark colors it would be worn with one of the new lingerie collar and vestee sets, to give it a touch of spring freshness.

In the regulation three-piece suits, made of plain cloth, hair-line stripes and novelty weaves, the blouse often matches the suit in color, but has touches of high color and metallic effects in its trimming and collar. Necks are high, with straight or turn over collars and skirts usually introduce plaits in some way. There is no regulation skirt length. The young girls wear them as short as they please, but the older women consider first becomingness and are privileged to wear the length that suits them best.

He Was a Nugget-Seeker

By MARTHA M. WILLIAMS

"GO! GO to—Halifax! Anywhere out of my sight!" Myrtle stormed.

Drury, her young sister, laughed teasingly as she flung back: "Thanky! But Minge Junction is plenty bad enough. Whatever made you camp in it, Sis Flower?"

"Shut up! Let me think!" Myrtle hissed through set teeth.

Drury had the money—rather her guardian did. The pair were half-sisters. Myrtle, exquisitely dark, slender and graceful as her name flower, with the accentings of velvet-dark eyes and red-coral lips, fiery, selfish, dominant, was ill-cast in the role of dependent. Drury was fat, but not placid. A shrewd bargainer, she was relentless in keeping bargains once made. Her mother, grandchild of plain hill folk, had mysteriously inherited a half million. It had bought her a husband, in the person of a renowned yet fascinating spendthrift.

When she was killed in a runaway accident two years later cynics said one to another: "The luck of Drury Greer!" He had been left very handsomely provided for—with only that lump of a baby, named for him, as the fly in the ointment.

Drury inherited all her mother's longing for power and high place. At ten, when her father died, leaving Myrtle scant tangible assets, she had driven her first bargain. Myrtle was to stay on, keeping the home up to Greer level, until Drury, properly trained and polished, had been launched socially and put in the way of making a brilliant marriage—this in return for a life of easy luxury.

Child that she was, Drury had realized this was her only chance. She had no background—all her mother's people were dead. Luckily—in a way. The money bought her only a sort of shamed tolerance from the Greers. All that is, but Myrtle—who albeit she stormed and raved sometimes, stood loyally to her promise despite the protests of Greers, and Lacys, her mother's kindred. Her heart had for two years belonged absolutely to one Elliot Lane, a masterful person, restive at waiting longer for his love.

It was this that had moved Myrtle to the desperate venture of Minge Junction—a place she had been told where money counted for everything. At home folk were barely civil to Drury now just turned seventeen. Despite the long bickerings, the stormy outbreaks, Myrtle had somewhat of sisterly love for the lone creature. Until she saw her in the way of being safely married she could not feel that she had a right to her own happiness.

They had come a day back to the gorgeous hotel. But as yet they themselves had not been seen. Raymond Carr, Esq., stood as a lion in the path. He was a sort of human Blue Book, knowing all about everything, everybody, all the nice points of usage. Why, Oh! Why had Fate sent him here? Myrtle had met him casually in her first winter out. He had declined to keep up the acquaintance, telling her hostess: "She is too beautiful—unless she had the million." Poor, fat, free-spoken Drury would be fair game for him.

Drury had vanished. Myrtle sat pondering a quick vanishing by the night train. She started to ring up the office and say so, but sat down almost fainting at what she saw through the open balcony window. Drury, bareheaded, standing mighty straight, facing Raymond Carr. He was smiling down at her—as he rarely had smiled at anything feminine. She had given him the thrill of his life—in blue linen, her broad cheeks richly pink, her clear blue eyes dancing, sandy tendrils clinging to her white forehead, she was an adorable milkmaid. To his dismay he had heard himself asking her: "Would you like a spin to the lake this morning?" And had been answered brightly: "Too late. Mister Man. Sis Flower wrote for a car as well as rooms. I'm sorry—real sorry she did."

She left him no time for debate, running on: "If the hotel car turns out to be just ordinary, won't you please see that we have a better one. please see that we have a better one."

"I shall see to it that you get it," Carr returned smiling broadly. "Even though I'm only a guest—like yourself."

"Oh! Mercy me! And I took you for a livery man," Drury interrupted, her cheeks true scarlet.

"Let's not spoil things by apologies," he said, touching her arm lightly. "No—don't tell me your name—I want to find it out for myself."

"I'd rather tell you—maybe you won't want to ask—when you hear it," Drury said humbly. "I'm Drury Greer. You—you must know all about me."

She was infinitely appealing—even to a human Blue Book. Raymond Carr took her hand, saying with a dazed smile: "Suppose we go find Sis Flower and ask her to chaperone us for a ride."

"You—you aren't fooling!" she asked breathlessly. He looked her full in the face, questioning: "Why should I be?"

"Oh! Because—because nobody ever before seemed to like me," Drury said huskily. "A girl at school said I'd never get a husband, unless he was hunting for gold nuggets."

"I am just that sort," Carr answered, trying to speak lightly. 'But please to remember—there is more than one sort of gold."

"What's up wi' ye, Tom?" asked several members of the company.

"What hast done?" eagerly inquired the company.

"I've wed her," replied Tom.—Weekly Scotsman.

ALIEN REGISTRATION IS NOT UNREASONABLE

In defending the proposal of Secretary of Labor Davis for the registration of aliens, tho National Republic editorially declares that the move is naturally opposed by many poople in America who do not have the best interests of the nation at heart. In Europe, it is stated, there is the strictest supervision of aliens, and most of those opposing the move in this country are the dupes or tools of European radicalism. The editorial says in part:

"For obvious reasons the proposal of Secretary of Labor Davis htat aliens be registered is vigorously opposed by aliens who are in the country through violation of the immigration laws and by interests engaged in "bootlegging" immigrants into the country. It is also opposed by communists, socialists and self-styled "liberals" in sympathy with them, who fear the apprehension and deportation of alien agitators engaged in carrying forward the bolshovist plot to overturn the American government by violence To these must be added some deluded sentimentalists more concerned about the individual hardship the enofrcement of such a law might impose upon aliens, than about the safety and welfare of the American government.

"Every alien legally in this country has opportunity to become an American citizen, thus escaping any hardship that might be involved under the proposed law in the necessity of registration and the payment of the tax of ten dollars for adults, with an anual fee of $5 thereafter, and of $3 a year for every child between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years Registration involves no greater hardship for those entitled to be in the countryt than is imposed by law upon every American citizen who owns an automobile or a dog, calling for a process or registration and payment of a fee. The unnaturalized alien has come to this country. in every case where his errand is legitimate, for the purpose of improving his economic condition: to share the better standards of wages and living this country affords As compared with the benefits thus secured, the fee proposed is a small one."

WHO BENEFITED MOST?

American newspaper correspondents abroad, and American travelers returning from Europe are almost unanimous in stating that at present citizens of the United States are none too popular in European countries, principally because of Uncle Sam's business-like policy in insisting that our foreign debt be liquidated in the interest of world credit and the American taxpayer.

There is every indication that another drive for cancellation of debts is under way and that the effort will be made to have the world believe that the United States is the only country to benefit from the war, that all other nations lost. Even Mr. Churchill, Great Britain's chancellor of the exchequer is quoted as saying that Uncle Sam is getting all of the reparations.

It is a little difficult for the average American to see just how the United States was more greatly benefitted than other nations by the war. We had our lists of dead and wounded, and we have our increased taxes which we will not be permitted to forget for many a year.

We received no indemnity, either in land or money, and all that we ask is that our foreign debts be paid up to reasonable capacity. But let us see how the allies shared in the post-war adjustments Germany claims to have paid $11,400,000,000 in money and material in the way of indemnity to the allies since the war ended The allies claim they have only received a little more than three billion. The eight billion difference is a little error in arithmetic on one side or the other. American experts if asked for an impartial opinion would probably fix the sum at more than three billion and less than eleven At any rate it is not a sum to be sneezed at.

And in addition to this indemnity there were some real estate transactions. France got Alsace-Lorraine and the use of the Sarre, Great Britain, Belgium and France got Togoland, Kamerun, Southwest Africa and German East Africa. England, Australia and New Zealand got the German islands in the Pacific, Poland got a slice of East Prussia, Italy got a slice of Austria and somebody got Shantung.

None of the spoils went to the United States either in building lots or money Evidently Uncle Sam didn't get it all.

Additional Klemme News

Eight miles of the county road south from Ventura will be graded and graveled this year. Work has already begun on the project. This is a much used road and with gravel on it the road will be more greatly used.

Mr. and Mrs. C. A Larson and daughter, La Vonn, drove to Webster City, Iowa, Saturday to attend the funeral of the infant son of Mr and Mrs. Oscar Larsen. The little baby lived but 26 hours. Sympathy of Klemme friends is extended to Mr and Mrs. Larsen in their sorrow.

Mr. Fred Oxley of Corwith, this week places his announcement in the Times for re-election as Supervisor. Mr. Oxley is now serving his first term in that office and is doing a good job of it, as far as weknow It has been cus omary to give a second term in this county, and Mr Oxley will undoubtedly be given that honor by the voters.

Our spell of balmy spring weather received a sudden jolt Tuesday evening when the wind switched to the north and it became gradually colder, with a light rain which turned into snow but did not fall heavy enough to whiten the ground. The thermometer is below the freezing mark and a thin crust of ice was formed on standing water yesterday morning. Prospects are looking a bit better for fair weather again.

There has been some talk that the two Methodist church buildings here might be moved together so that a larger church might be had at a small expense The remodeled affair would be put into a good serviceable condition at a small outlay of money. We understand, however, that the plan has been adandoned for the time being. Some would rather wait another year or two and build a fine new structure, which, perhaps, is a better plan.

Ernest Palmby and family drove down from Vernon Center, Minnesota, early Sunday morning and surprised Mr. and Mrs. Henry Wille for breakfast, arriving in Klemme at 6:30 o'clock. For dinner they were invited to the Albert Barz home. Besides the Palmby family, Mr. and Mrs. Barz entertained the following people for dinner: Mr. and Mrs. Henry Wille, Lesley Hartbeck and family, Harold Leitzinger and family, and Fred Barz and family. The Palmby family left for home Sunday evening.

Theo ld Methodist tabenacle at Concord, just south of Garner, is being taken down and will be moved to Charles City and erected for use at camp meeting. According to the Garner Signal the Boy Scout Council of Garner is planning to raise funds to purchase the grounds for a Boy Scout camp site. There are about two acres in the tract and is well wooded with nice trees. It would be an ideal place for the boys. The site was the former location of Hancock County's old court house, before the famous "court house battle" after which the county seat was then moved to Garner into the new building, where it is now located.

Mr. C. A. Halverson, of near Miller, is this week placing his announcement in The Times for the office of County Treasurer. Mr. Halverson gives us the information that he was born and raised in Hancock County and has been a resident of Ellington township, where he is now farming. As to his qualifications to the office which he seeks, he has had quite a lot of experience in public work, as he is the Clerk of his township, is a member of the Miller Independent School Board, and is a graduate of the Waldorf College, at Forest City, where he finished a commercial course. This is the first time Mr. Halverson seeks a county office.

TIMELY GARDEN TIPS

Get Some Vegetables Out Now

In most parts of Iowa the vegetable garden should now be one of the busiest places around the home. Generally this is a safe time to transplant most of the hardy vegetables from the window boxes or hotbeds to the field.

Before transplanting any of these plants to the field, however, they should be gradually exposed to the outside conditions such as lower temperatures and smaller amounts of water This makes them much more able to withstand the severe outdoor conditions. Plants of head lettuce, leaf lettuce, cabbage and cauliflower may now be transplanted to the garden. Additional plantings may also be made of these hardy vegetables.

The hotbed can be emptied enough now to start seeds of cucumbers, squash and melons in paper bands or berry boxes for transplanting in May. These are very tender and should be protected from the slightest frost. Place the empty boxes or paper bands as closely together as possible on the soil of the hotbed.

It is best to keep the glass or cloth cover on the hotbed continually until quite warm weather is at hand, but a small amount of fresh air should be allowed to enter at least once a day:—Ora Smith. instructor in Vegetable Crops. Iowa State College.

Time to Prune, Doctor Shrubs

Now is the time to prune shrubs. And it is also the time to doctor ailing shrubs back to health thru cultivation and mulching, according to R. Rothacker, assistant professor of landscape architecture at Iowa State College.

The old shrub wood should be cut out to give the young shoots a better chance. Cares hould be taken not to cut out more than one-third of the old wood for such practice tends to foster suckering growth. One should take care while pruning to "thin out" rather than "cut back," which gives a bobbed hair effect. The conservative practice of leaving the shrub in its natural form is the most successful. Early flowering shrubs may be pruned after they are thru blooming.

If any scale is present a lime sulfur spray should be applied before the leaves appear for a lime sulfur solution strong enough to kill scale will burn the leaves too.

Make It "Hot" For Bugs and Worms

Burning over old matted sod and dry weed patches in the early spring is an excellent way to kill a great many harmful crop pests such as cutworms, army worms, sucking plant bugs, leaf hoppers and the chinch bug. This is the suggestion offered by B. B. Fulton, entomologist at the Iowa Agricultural Experiment Station, Ames.

"It is surprising how many insects can be found hiding in such places as matted sod, weed patches and in banks of dead leaves," says Mr Fulton. "Army worms and cutworms are curled up in the matted grass ready for the first garden vegetables. Sucking plant bugs and leaf hoppers are also abundant, to say nothing of the well known chinch bug and eggs of the common stalk borer."

Definition Of A Shick

A shiek is a man with slick hair, full pants and empty pockets. He has more time than a city judge Each shiek thinks that he is the original "Woman's Home Companion" He has an education that is hard to find. He can be found at all parties where everything is free. He never takes a girl to a pay party, but will fight to take her home. While there he will treat her very nice and also very seldom. The supply of shieks exceeds the demand by many millions. He is of no more value to the public than a refrigerator is to an Eskimo.

CLEANING PROBLEM BOBS UP

Homemaker Must Choose Between Washing and Dry Cleaning

Practically every textile article in this land of soft coal and hard water must be cleaned sooner or later and often it is a problem for the homemaker to decide whether to have a piece dry cleaned or washed, says Mrs. Olive Settles of the Home Economics Division, Iowa State College.

"When there is a question about whether to dry clean or wash a garment, test it to see if the color is fast," Mrs. Settles advises. The test is as follows: "Place a drop of ammonia on a seam or inside on a hem, then with a fold of paper between the thumb and cloth, press this spot down on a white blotter. If the color does not run, the fabric will stand washing. Of course the washing must be done according to the best methods for each fiber.

"Clean winter window draperies according to the fiber. That is, if cotton, they can be washed with soap and water, unless of pile fabric; in that case, they will have to be sent to a dry cleaner. Silk draperies, such as pongee, wash easily, but must be ironed dry to prevent spotting. Other silk hangings may have to be dry cleaned.

"Artificial silk, or rayon fabrics, are very hard to clean. The sun and dust weaken them so that the curtains sometimes fall to pieces during the first season. If incorrectly drycleaned, they will do the same. Dip a sample of the curtain fabric in water and test its strength by tearing. If cotton yarns run both ways the material will stand washing in mild soap and warm water.

"If cotton is used for the warp, that is the lengthwise yarn, and rayon for the filling, usually the water will weaken the fabric so that the slightest strain tears it. This kind of material should be carefully washed at home, handling the curtains as little as possible while wet. Rayon regains most of its strength as it dries, so it is ready for another season.

"Feathers are successfully washed in laundries, and economically too. They are actually washed and dried like any other household article and come back clean and fluffy."

"That's the Kind of Fence I Want"

A GOOD many of our customers in driving to town have admired and later inquired of us about the fine looking Red Top posted fences that are springing up all through this locality. Our reply always is that Red Top Steel fence posts make just as good fences as they make good looking ones. The Red Top is all you want in a fence post and a whole lot more than you expect. Our experience with the line has proved these facts.

Red Tops Make Stock-Proof, Trouble-Free Fences

This sturdy reinforced post will turn the most persistent stock at all times. You don't have to worry about "fence breaks." The post is firmly seated in the ground as it is driven and the anchor plate holds it secure and upright. The fence wire is everlastingly locked to the post; it cannot be pushed or pulled away, it will not slip up or down.

Red Topped Fences are Quickly and Easily Erected

Red Tops are driven at the rate of 200 to 300 a day by one man whose only assistant is the Red Top Post Driver. No helper is needed. No holes to dig, posts to set, nor tamping to do. One man unassisted attaches the fence wire to Red Tops in a jiffy with Red Top Handy Fasteners which come free with all Red Top Studded Posts.

Red Tops Reduce the Cost of Fences

Your savings begin with the driving of the first Red Top. Due to the small cost of driving them, they actually cost less installed than wood posts. The trouble and expense of constant restapling, restretching and fence repair are saved because Red Tops hold the fencing securely. And then there's the big saving on post replacements which the long life of the Red Top makes possible.

Come in and see this improved post the next time you are in town. Prices are very reasonable now; we recommend early buying.

COMPLICATIONS

SYNOPSIS.—Traveling by canoe on the Mississippi, on his way to Biloxi, in the early days of the settlement of Louisiana, William Brampton, English spy, known to Indians and settlers as the "White Indian," sees a Natchez Indian post a declaration of war against the French. For his own purposes, he hastens to Biloxi to carry the news to Bienville, French governor. Brampton meets an old friend, Joe Labrador, Indian halfbreed, who warns him Bienville has threatened to hang him as a spy. Brampton refuses to turn back. He falls in with Jules and Basile Mattor, on their way to Biloxi to secure wives from a ship, the Maire, bringing women from France. At Biloxi Brampton proteots a woman from a sergeant's brutality. She tells him she is Claire Dahlsgaarde, picked up in a raid in Paris. Evidently well bred and educated, she is a mystery to Brampton. He intervenes to prevent a man, English, known as "Old Six Fingers," following her to New Orleans. A Frenchman, Francois Narbonne, slightly demented by stories he has heard of the riches of the New World, introduces himself. Bienville accuses Brampton of treachery, but the latter secures a respite from death by revealing the Natchez declaration of war. He is to await the arrival of a former companion, Damoan the Fox, who will exonerate or condemn him. Damoan has documents proving Brampton an English spy. Brampton receives a message from Claire, begging him to help her reach the English settlements. Brampton trusts Narbonne with a note to Claire promising to meet her at New Orleans. He plans his escape. After a struggle Brampton wrests the incriminating papers from Damoan and escapes from Biloxi. He meets the Mattors and they go to New Orleans in a sailing packet. At the landing place Brampton again encounters Joe Labrador, whom he sends to bring Claire to him. Brampton questions her closely, but she will tell him little of her history. With Labrador, Brampton and Claire leave in two canoes for the English settlements. Claire turns out to be a creature of moods and a terrible handicap in a race for life.

—10—

"One must catch the fish first," was the quiet response. "Besides, I placed the wood on the blaze monsieur started. The coals will be ready."

"All the wood?" I shaarply demanded.

She bridled at my tone. A tug at my line demanded my attention. After a brief fight I landed a catfish.

She waited until I had secured my hook and coiled my line; then she said:

"The wood was to burn?"

"Yes, yes. But not all at once. A little at a time."

"I was not to know without being told," she said with much dignity. "If monsieur will be explicit another time perhaps I will do better. But wood! La! La! There is nothing but wood. Surely one does not have to be sparing of wood in this land!"

I hesitated whether to explain the danger of big fires and much smoke being seen by an enemy, or to wait and after acting as my own fire-tender for a while, see if she did not learn her lesson by observation.

I Darted My Gaze on the River. I Discovered Nothing Until She Stood Close at My Side and Pointed a Finger.

"If we have finished with the matter of the fire," she quietly resumed, "I would like to ask monsieur the meaning of that object which floats upstream across the dying patch of sunlight."

I darted my gaze on the river. I discovered nothing until she stood close at my side and pointed a finger; then I saw it, a canoe, far out and presumably hunting for dead water on the opposite shore.

"Indians. Probably Humas. We are in their country," I told her.

"Are they wicked? Will they trouble us?" she demanded, glancing up into my face.

"Not a bit." Nor was I afraid of Indians, for I had many friends among the river people, including the Humas.

Returning my gaze to the river I was troubled to observe the canoe was making no progress toward the opposite shore. And only white men, ignorant of the river, would skirt the edge of the mighty current and barely hold their own, when easy paddling was to be enjoyed along the shore.

"Now one can hardly see them," she cried.

"We'll go back and cook our fish," I said. The canoe was heading toward us, thus making it appear to be a speck. And I had no doubt the smoke from our generous fire had attracted the voyageurs' attention. If Damoan and his companions were on the same side with us the intervening forest would prevent his seeing the smoke. It was his manito against mine, and I was hampered by an irresponsible girl-woman.

CHAPTER VIII

What the Smoke Brought.

Even if the distant canoe was making for our smoke I did not see how I could break camp and hide in the forest, or take to the pirogue. Had I been alone the problem of avoiding the two men would have been child's play; but the girl would hold me back in the woods, while to continue in the pirogue would bring the men upon us. I was convinced they could not be some of Damoan's men, and this belief reconciled me somewhat to meeting them. On reaching the fire I hurriedly cleaned the fish. The girl watched my preparations with a little grimace. I feared she was overfastidious.

I broiled the fish on the coals and served it on two clean pieces of bark. She sat back from the fire and tentatively nibbled at some smoked meat but refused the fish. This was an arraignment of my rough-and-ready cooking, and provoking because she had made no offer to do the squaw-work herself. I was beginning to realize how entirely useless this young person was when it came to caring for herself. For one raised in poverty the instinct of self-preservation seemed to be meagerly developed; of course, her hands should have told me that at the beginning.

She eyed the tough smoked meat disapprovingly; then bravely remarked:

"The fire burned well."

"Exceedingly well, mademoiselle!"

Another, and a longer pause; then she was timidly remarking:

"There came to me the absurd notion that monsieur was displeased because I used the wood. But I tell myself there is much wood, enough for all France. Also, the more wood the more coals. What have I done that is wrong?"

"Nothing that is wrong. Only, this fire—I asked the wood to be fed on a little at a time. You put it all on at once."

"But it made a good fire, monsieur. You have said it yourself. I fear you are overnice in your exactions."

"I only mention it because the heavy smoke is drawing the strange canoe to our shore, and soon we shall have visitors," I gently explained. "I would have said nothing this time, but I did not want mademoiselle to be taken by surprise, and, perhaps, alarmed."

"This awful country, where the simplest act may bring death!" she dramatically whispered.

I smiled reassuringly.

"Hardly death, or we would not be here waiting. It is nothing—these strangers coming. I only mention them so mademoiselle will not be startled."

"You have your musket close my your side, as if you feared! I, too, will be ready."

And she pulled the sheathed dirk from her bosom and allowed it to hang outside her blouse. Then as an inspiration: "But the log boat! We should hide it. Then they could not find us."

"Now that they have seen the smoke it is better that they find us," I answered. "If we should disappear they would find the fire, and they would go on up the river and tell of the deserted camp. It would be bad for them to tell such news to Damoan the Fox."

Finishing my fish, I took my gun and said:

"Mademoiselle's courage is fine. She will sit where she is while I withdraw to one side."

"I do not understand," she faltered.

"By this time the two men will be landing near our pirogue. They will reconnoiter cautiously. I must get them to the fire to see who they are, to make sure they carry no tales ahead of us."

"But would you leave me here alone?"

"Only as bait for the trap into which they must walk. As soon as they break cover I will be by your side."

"Monsieur does not go far away?"

'Only inside the trees. Have courage. Nothing shall harm you."

"I am not afraid of men," she coldly replied, now sitting very erect. "It is the land, the great river, the unnamable loneliness, that brings fear. But I shall not disgrace you."

The grande dame air in a doll; and yet she carried it off most excellently. I took my musket and slipped into cover and waited. I heard the two men climbing the bluff long before they should have betrayed themselves. The carelessness, or awkwardness, of their approach told me they were not coureurs de bois. This left them colonists from New Orleans, sent in blundering pursuit of me; and I was confident I could soon send them to the right about.

Now they were passing through the last fringe of bushes encircling the fire, and the girl suddenly gave a shrill scream. As I glided forward to close the trap I heard a rough voice yell in English:

"Blast my eyes if it ain't her! Ahoy, lass, where's your convoy?"

"Here!" I spoke up, stepping into the firelight, my musket across my left arm.

The girl was crouching behind a log and from her face one would have thought she was facing a panther. Old Six Fingers, more apish than ever, stood leering at her, his yellow snags showing in an ugly grin. On recognizing me he lowered his arm, and with a scowl growled:

"So it's you, is it?"

"Ho, Monsieur Brampton, we meet again!" loudly greeted Narbonne, lunging clear of a grapevine. "Behold, I give you the freedom of my river! Mademoiselle, command me. I throw myself at your feet."

She rose and seated herself on the log in an effort to recover her dignity, but never allowing her frightened eyes to stray long from the grinning face of Six Fingers.

"Monsieur Narbonne was so good as to do me a service in la Nouvelle Orleans. His presence is always most welcome," she nervously assured the Frenchman.

"We go up the river to find the country of Acaanibas, where the diamonds grow on rose-bushes, and the women are almost as beautiful as mademoiselle," prattled Narbonne with a smirk at the girl.

"And now we's picked you up we'll sail in convoy," grinned Six Fingers.

And he broke into some of his horrible sea doggerel and began chanting:

Heave-ho! And the devil
He sits in the sun'
Hurrah, bullies, for the Spanish main!
Heave-ho! And the red blood
From whits throats will run!
Hurrah!

Narbonne was nearest to him, and with a backhanded sweep he stilled the vicious lips and sent Six Fingers over backward.

Now, I had no desire for either of the two to be traveling ahead of me. Narbonne would not wittingly harm me, but he was eccentric, to say the least. His companion was capable of any infamy if left unwatched. So I affected the role of pacificator, and said:

"Let bygones be bygones. Six Fingers forgot his sea-ditties are not for young ears. He will not forget again. Come, come, men; you'll need stout hearts for your journey to the Acaanibas."

Six Fingers pressed his fingers to his split lips and made animal noises. Narbonne was staring at him coldly, one hand on the hilt of his sword. The old villain essayed something intended for an affable smile, and croaked:

"Rough day, mate; but I'm used to rough living and rough ways. I was forgetting the lass. I'll stay for'ard after this. And there's a jug of brandy in the boat what I'll overhaul."

I signaled for Narbonne to let him go, for his departure would give me a chance to talk alone with the Frenchman. Once Six Fingers had disappeared toward the edge of the bluff I drew Narbonne farther apart from the girl and said:

"You know I am being hunted. Perhaps you do not know that there are those ahead whom I fear more than all those remaining behind. I do not know how far I can trust your companion, but to you I tell this: At Point Coupee, a day's journey from here, the river makes a big loop. My enemies will, I believe, follow the main channel. There is a small bayou, or canal, not more than six feet wide and usually choked with drift at the opening. If I can reach that unseen and cut across the loop I will save a day. It is at Point Coupee I plan to get ahead of my pursuers."

Narbonne stiffly answered:

"Monsieur, I have an equity in this cursed river. I am a landed proprietor. I have invested a hundred thousand livres in this country. I am responsible for law and order. I shall go with you to protect you."

He said it as if standing in the center of broad ancestral acres, as if an army of minions was ready to carry out his every wish. And his heart was as honest in its purpose as if he had commanded the obedience and servility paid to Louis XIV in his lifetime.

I tried to thank him for carrying my note to Mademoiselle Dahlsgaarde, but he would not permit, declaring:

"Nay, not so. The thanks are for me to utter. It gave me the rarest pleasure to speak with mademoiselle again. I am in your debt."

The girl now shyly advanced and extended a hand to Narbonne, saying:

"I have the brave Frenchman to thank again."

The absurd fellow was all but kneeling as he reverently kissed the slim hand, his cap gathering more grime from the forest-mold. And I was popeyed to observe how calmly she accepted his homage. She retired to her log, pulling us along after her by the exquisite charm of her manner. It caused me grim amusement, and some chagrin, to realize she waited until Narbonne was present before exercising the height of her charm. With a glance to make sure Six Fingers was not within hearing she confessed:

"Messieurs, I am much afraid of that man."

Narbonne bowed and turned to leave us, but I seized his arm and detained him. He roughly shook off my grasp and whispered:

"Did you not hear? I have endured the little beast, but surely mademoiselle should not be annoyed."

She understood this byplay and was between us. "If you have respect for the women of France you will dismiss such black thoughts from your mind," she murmured. "Of course I feel no fear when you two are with me."

The Girl Now Shyly Advanced, and Extended a Hand to Narbonne, Saying, "I Have the Brave Frenchman to Thank Again."

To me her fear of Six Fingers was incomprehensible. He was only a senile old spider of a man, who could do no mischief beyond hurling a knife and guzzling brandy.

Narbonne surrendered his purpose of seeking Six Fingers and putting him to the sword, and said:

"The old thief goes with me to the land of Acaanibas, where his pirate's soul can revel over hills of gold. He will not discommode mademoiselle. We two will push on ahead."

I feared for Six Fingers' treacherous old tongue if he fell in with Damoan. It was not my plan to have him ahead of me, spreading the news of our coming.

"Our ways, monsieur, are the same for many leagues," I said. "It is my wish that you and your companion travel in our company."

With a side-glance I directed the girl to second the invitation. She returned my look rather defiantly, but was warm and gracious in adding:

"I also ask it. You will not refuse me, monsieur?"

"God pity a madness which would permit me to refuse you, mademoiselle," he piously exclaimed. "Now we will take the creature from the brandy, or the king of Acaanibas will go with a dry throat. It is incredible, monsieur, the amount of drink that withered old man can hold."

"Of course you do not really believe there is any land called Acaanibas?"

"No Acaanibas? Impossible."

"There is no such land, monsieur. I have been through the region—the Falls of St. Anthony—where he located the fairyland. It was not there. It never was there."

"Mon Dieu!" he muttered, wiping his forehead. "Is there anything true about this country?"

"All you have seen is true. It continues the same to the Great Lakes in the north. Wild waters. Wild woods. Wild men and beasts. No diamonds. No gold or silver as yet found. No giants nor dwarfs. No place where the Indians are anything but Indians. No land of plenty until you clear the ground, plant and reap."

Nothing but disaster can come to such an ill-assorted party. What will the disaster be?

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 83

"Purges" and "Physics" Bad for Old Folks

While Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, knew that constipation was the curse of advancing age, he did not believe that a "purge" or "physic" every little while was necessary.

To him, it seemed cruel that so many constipated old people had to be kept constantly "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin he discovered a laxative which helps to "regulate" the bowels of old folks. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin not only causes a gentle, easy bowel movement but each dose helps to strengthen the bowel muscles, shortly establishing natural "regularity." It never gripes, sickens, or upsets the system. Besides, it is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take.

If past fifty, buy a large bottle at any store that sells medicine and just see for yourself.

Most of the doctorates (advanced degrees for research) conferred by American colleges in 1925 reveals the interesting fact that chemistry is far in the lead, with a total of 244 doctorates granted. Zoology is next, with 181. At the bottom of the list are geology, with 0, paleontology, with 1, and anthropology, with 2. Physics, thought by many to be chemistry's closest rival, in reality claimed only 56 devotees.

Evil Influences at Work in Big Cities

A group of professors in the University of Chicago has made a study of the influences at work in American city life. These influences, of course, were found to be greatly different from those of country life or small-town life; and the manner of their operation is all the more significant in view of the rapid transition of America's population from rural to urban conditions. The general theory was advanced by these investigators that city life tends to develop and accentuate both the best and the worst in people.

Hence, in many respects, the cities have become the chief centers of progress. The cities as a rule have better schools, better churches, better health conditions and more leaders in every field of activity than communities of limited population. That is the most encouraging fact about the growth of cities in this country.

But another influence is at work. Its nature is indicated in the recent study. It is evident in what is termed the "mobility" of city life, the forces at work to break up the home and permanent human relationships. The centers of mobility, of bright lights, of varied and questionable attractions, of bad companionships, were found to be linked up closely with crime, "juvenile delinquency, boys' gangs, poverty, wife desertion, divorce and abandoned infants." Individual control is least effective where these disintegrating forces are strongest, "and there develop areas of demoralization, promiscuity and vice.

The good and the evil of human nature that are brought out strongly in centers of population, however, are brought into stronger contrast, in fact, into stronger conflict. It can hardly be believed that the result of this conflict will be the triumph of the evil.—Chicago Post.

Rented House Never Like Dream of Home

We rent a house. It's but a transient place.
We cannot plan to stay there very long.
It's not just what we want, in any case.
We'll move again when robins bring their song.

We rent a house, and plan while we are there
An altar for our household gods and comb
The papers for a bargain that is fair.
We rent a house, and plan to build a home!

We rent a house, and living there we dream
Of one small plot of land we'll call our own.
A tree that's ours through which the stars will gleam,
A lamp whose light shines out for us alone.

A house we build—one that expresses true
Our very selves, clear to its farthest dome.
The sweet fulfillment of a dream we know!
We rent a house, but, oh, we build a home!

—Detroit Free Press.

Home Town Loyalty

Speaking of faith in the old home town the Tifton (Ga.) Gazette says:

"Where the home folks exhibit a faith that is well founded and sure that every newcomer feels it in the air and catches the spirit, too, the town goes forward; builds new houses and starts new industries, thereby increasing in wealth and population. Where the home folks are not sure about their community's future; have a doubt and speak of its future with a question mark in their tone, no matter how enthusiastic the newcomer may be, he soon loses this enthusiasm and gets into the old rut, too, or moves on to a place where the home folks do believe in their town."

Home-Owning Thrift

No more worthy movement has started than the "own your home" appeal. Nothing so makes for thrift and saving as to start paying for a home of one's own, and money saved in this way would be saved in no other manner and for no other purpose. Also, it has been found true that the man of family who owns his home is more contented, more satisfied with conditions generally than the family which must shift or move at the landlord's every whim.

Garden Fence Important

Substantially fenced gardens give the owners and their families assurance that their labor and expense incurred for seed will not be lost. The entire family will take a new and active interest in having the best possible garden where the plot is safe from chickens and stock and dog marauders.—Capper's Weekly.

Many City Managers

Records developed at the annual convention of the City Managers' association at Grand Rapids indicate steady growth in the number of cities adopting the city manager plan. In the United States and Canada are now 358 such cities.

Use of Evergreens

Planting of a number of small evergreens near the house will give a cheery appearance in winter. They are cheap.

GOOD ROADS

WASTE IS BUGBEAR IN ROAD BUILDING

Few motorists as they roll smoothly over the magnificent pavements now found in many parts of the country realize the detailed and painstaking research which preceded the laying of the pavement. To many, a road is a road, and no matter what the type of surface or the local conditions, road building to them is largely a matter of smoothing the ground and providing some kind of a hard surface.

But had such a policy been followed, millions of dollars would have been wasted, and the country would today be mired in a bog of replacement, repair and reconstruction. Because of the farsightedness of engineers in charge of road building this possible waste has been prevented, and the pavements being laid today are the best possible.

Road construction, as practiced today, is a highly specialized business. Good, permanent construction insures years of earning power and the saving of millions of dollars in transportation costs. Poor construction means waste that mounts into almost countless figures.

Foremost among the possible sources of waste is the construction of roads of lower type than justified by traffic. Tests conducted in many parts of the country have proved that a road should be built according to its maximum requirements rather than to its minimum. A dirt road carrying a traffic of 110 tons per day, in general, will pay for gravel in ten years by the saving in operating costs. Traffic on a dirt road exceeding 610 tons per day or traffic on a gravel road exceeding 1,450 tons per day will, in general, pay for a concrete, brick or asphalt road in fifteen years by the saving. These figures, established by the Iowa highway commission, are today being taken as standard for determining the type of surface justified.

Scientific research has established some remarkable facts about subgrades. Formerly it was held that all soils could be drained, no matter how wet and unstable in their natural condition. On the Bates road in Springfield, Ill., two years were spent in investigating drainage. Tests firmly established the fact that in clay soils, little can be done to reduce the moisture content by drainage. The wastes in highway funds saved through this research returned taxpayers millions of dollars.

Again referring to the Bates test, which is perhaps the most comprehensive yet conducted, tests have made it possible to build a road which is permanent and able to stand up under any given volume of traffic if properly maintained. Through research the public is now protected against building road pavements too light for the volume of traffic which will use the road and which break down under traffic.

Similarly, after having determined the volume of traffic, road builders need not build a pavement too heavy for the traffic the road will carry. This saves overinvestment in road pavements.

Good Roads Challenge

Hard-surfaced roads eliminate isolation, which signifies progressive civilization. All the country is rapidly forging ahead to that much desired goal when millions of cars and trucks can negotiate the highways without wrecking their high-priced machinery and burning vast quantities of valuable fuel to force their way from place to place by plowing furrows during rainy periods, on all our dirt roads. The hard-surfaced road will present to each town or city through which it passes with remorseless persistence, this ultimatum: "Do or die; function or perish from the earth." If such there be, the builders of each city will decide its destiny and the business men its fate.

Good Roads Hints

Good roads is a matter of vastly more than convenience or political concern.

* * *

The best is the cheapest applies to road construction as well as to anything else.

* * *

Good roads are making our farm lands worth more, therefore they are a good investment.

* * *

A central system of highways has been established—the federal 7 per cent system of approximately 200,000 miles.

* * *

Eighty-eight motorbus companies are operating 800 busses and covering more than 2,000 miles on hard roads in Illinois.

* * *

Good roads can only be secured through scientific methods of construction, reliable contractors and time-tested types of pavement.

* * *

Some 80,000 miles on the federal aid system have been selected in co-operation with the states for uniform danger and direction sign posting.

MIDDLE AGE BRINGS NEW INTERESTS

For Women in Good Health

MRS. HARVEY TUCKER
408 WALKER STREET, SHELBYVILLE, IND.

"Grow old along with me,
The best is yet to be"

With her children grown up, the middle-aged woman finds time to do the things she never had time to do before—read the new books, see the new plays, enjoy her grandchildren, take an active part in church and civic affairs. Far from being pushed aside by the younger set, she finds a full, rich life of her own. That is, if her health is good.

Thousands of women of middle age, say they owe their vigor and health to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Those who have learned through their own experience the merit of this dependable medicine are enthusiastic in recommending it to their friends and neighbors.

"I had been in bad condition for three months. I could not do my work. One day I read what your medicine had done and just had a feeling that it would help me, so I sent and got a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I had only taken half a bottle when I got up and started to do my work. It gave me an appetite, and helped me wonderfully. I can not praise this medicine highly enough. I surely will advise all women and girls to take it, and they don't have to use rouge to look healthy. My two daughters are taking it now and one is also using the Sanative Wash. I am willing to have you use this testimonial and I will answer letters from women asking about the medicine."—Mrs. Harvey Tucker, 408 Walker St., Shelbyville, Indiana.

"I read about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in the little books you give away and began to take the medicine. After the first few bottles I began to feel better and could eat better and had fewer headaches. I feel like a different person. At anytime that I don't feel good I take the Vegetable Compound again, as I always keep a bottle on hand. You may use this letter for every word is true. I will answer any letters sent to me."—Mrs. Jennie Bollerman, 516 Smith St., West Hoboken, N. J.

Kept Record Straight

The record in school attendance for Monmouthshire, England, has been created by Cora Price, fifteen-year-old daughter of a Varteg miner, who has not been late or absent once in ten years, says the London Mail.

From her home at the top of a mountain, the girl struggled through the snowstorms which occurred shortly before Christmas, in order that her record might not be spoiled.

Congress
No. 1

I went to Washington the other day. I visited "The House of Representatives," they were in session. What I mean by being in session, the tax bill was up for debate and they were arguing on "Better Golf courses for the medium salaried man." I suppose if the World Court bill had been up, they would have been talking on "Shall America park oblong or parallel."

Well, then I went over to the Senate. They had adjourned, so I felt that America was not having such a bad day at that. We were only 50 percent inefficient THAT DAY.

You know we all joke and kid about Congress, but we can't improve on them. No matter who we elect, he is just as bad as the one he replaced. So with all their faults we love 'em. They are as good as the people who vote to put them there, and they are 10 times better than the ones who don't vote at all. They are like "Bull" Durham, they are not perfect, but they are the best in their line.

TIMELY GARDEN TIPS

Last Call For Potato Planting

Are your potatoes in? This week is the "dead line" except in southern Iowa, where "spuds" may be planted in late May.

Potatoes need a deep, very fine sandy loam soil. Alfalfa or clover ground which has been plowed under, well manured and has grown one crop of corn following the clover or alfalfa, makes ideal "spud" ground. The manure should be applied the year before the potatoes are planted for fresh manure has a tendency to increase scab injury.

These four varieties are best for Iowa: Early Ohio, Irish Cobbler, Rural New Yorker and Green Mountain. If possible, secure seed from the northern potato states of Minnesota, North Dakota and Michigan, for the yield there is anywhere from one-fourth to one-half larger than ordinaryily secured in Iowa. Certified seed is safer as it is quite free of mixtures and diseases.

All seed should be treated before planted so as to reduce disease. One of the easiest small scale methods is to soak the potatoes for 2 hours in water containing 1 pound of formaldehyde solution to each 30 gallons of water. The solution acts best near 60 degrees F. After treatment the potatoes should either be dried out or cut and planted immediately.

Time To Choose Annual Flowers

It is time for flower lovers to decide on what annuals to plant this spring. Annuals are very popular with many because of low cost and because most of them bloom continually thruout the summer.

Fortunately, most annuals are easy to grow. Some, however, do not respond very well to the cold ground of early spring and should be started in hotbeds or cold frames in late March or early April. It is too late for that now, so the best thing to do with such annuals as petunias, ageratum, salvia, pansy and verbena is to buy the plants from some florist or gardener.

Just as some annuals ought to be transplanted, others cannot stand transplanting. These later must be planted where they are to bloom. Popies, sweet peas, portulaca and California poppies fall in this list of "cranky" flowers.

The following annuals make suitable beds and border: sweet alyssum, marigolds, zinnias, China aster, pinks, cornflower, nasturtium, coreopsis calendula, larkspur and phlox.

To Have Flowers All Season Is Only Matter Of Planting Right

A good plan to follow in selecting for the perennial flower bed is to choose flowers which bloom at different times of the year. The flower bed can be kept in bloom from April or May to October with careful selection, according to E. C. Volz of Iowa State College.

Two good spring flowering perennials are Basket of Gold and Creeping Phlox. The Basket of Gold is a yellow variety and the Creeping Phlox is white and pink.

For June or July blooming flowers, the peony, German Iris or Hardy Larkspur are good. All three plants bloom vari-colored flowers. Foxglove, Canterbury Bell, Shasta Daisy and Hardy Phlox are good standard varieties for the late summer months. With the exoeption of the Shasta Daisy, which is white, these varieties are also vari-colored.

Two purple flowers, the Purple Cone Flower and the New England Aster, are among the best autumn bloomers Both plants grow tall, from three to four feet.

Those who want these flowers to bloom this year had better buy the plants from a nursery, Voltz advises. It is the safest to procure the Peony and German Iris plants at a nursery, regardless of when they are wanted to bloom, for, as a rule, most folks have poor luck in trying to raise them from seeds, he says.

All the other flowers may be grown from seeds, but if they are planted this spring they will not bloom until next year.

We've often wondered why those who are against things in general can make so much more noise than those who are not.

NEW AUTO PLATES BLUE BACKGROUND

NEW SYSTEM OF NUMBERING AUTO LICENSE PLATES TO BE USED IN IOWA NEXT YEAR

Automobile license serial numbers will be changed next year, according to the state motor vehicle department. Wright county will then have number 88, instead of number 99 as at present, and so on down the line for the other counties. That should put Hancock County's prefix number down to 36. Next year's license plates will have a blue background and the numerals are orange or yellow, a mixture of the two.

Counties containing 10,000 or more automobiles will have plates with a letter prefix instead of the numbers 1 to 9, as at the present time Thus Polk County will have the letter A as a prefix. Woodbury County will have letter B, and so on. The letter I will be omitted, because of its similarity to the numeral 1 Des Moines and Cerro Gordo counties will move into the 10,000 car class next year and taking he counties with 10,000 cars out of the numerical classification reduces the numbers for the smaller counties. Adair county will be number 1, and so on down the list to Wright county which will be number 88.

Non-resident cars will be numbered the same as heretofore with a double cipher (00-).

MAY PAY TO TREAT SEED CORN

Where Seed Cannot Be Given Individual Ear Test, Mold Treatment Is Helpful

Where there is no possibility of testing each individual ear of seed corn, mold treatment will prove beneficial this spring because of the poor quality of the seed corn. This is the belief of H. D. Hughes, head of the Farm Crops Department at Iowa State College.

Experiments both at Iowa State College and at Bloomington, Ill. show seed corn treatment to be beneficial, but not equal to individual ear testing. Ear testing should be practiced if possible, says Mr. Hughes. Many are apt to view seed treatment as a "cure-all" and suffer as a consequence for disease treatment will never revive dead kernels. The individual test will ferret out these bad ars, and from that standpoint xcels the treating method.

Uspulun, a trade germicide, has met with much success in seed corn treatment, it being especially effective with the fungus diplodia, the most serious of seed corn diseases, according to Mr. Hughes.

To treat between 10 and 12 bushels of corn with Uspulun, mix 1 lb. of dry Uspulun in 25 gal. of water. Mix this in a 50 gal. barrel. Immerse the shelled corn in the solution, two bushels at a time, in a gunny sack. Allow it to soak for an hour and a half and then spread out on the floor in a thin layer to dry. One solution will treat from 10 to 12 bushels of corn.

GIVE THE FARM HOME A DISTINCTIVE NAME

"Name your farm home" is the slogan of a movement fostered by home demonstration agents in Tennessee for the past four years. More than 3,000 homes have already been named, according to a report received by the United States Department of Agriculture. This year the idea is again being stressed, as there are still many homes which have not registered a distinctive name either with the extension service or the State Department of Agriculture. The State recently passed a law permitting such registry.

Farm home owners are urged to give some thought and trouble to the selection of the right name. It should be dignified, suitable, lasting, not too common, easy to say, easy to read, and easy to remember. It should appear on the mall box or over it. or on a signboard, or on the gate. It is intended that it should be used on letterheads and on the label of anything sold from the farm.

The naming of the farm home is often the first step in general home improvement. There is an effort to live up tot he spirit which has been embodied in the new name. The indirect effect of the name can often be seen in the grading and standardizing of products offered for sale.

NEW SCHOOL BUILDINGS VOTED DOWN AT AVERY ELECTION MONDAY AFTERNOON

At the special election held in Avery Township Monday afternoon the proposition to build a new school house at a cost of $3,000.00 was turned down by the voters of the township three to one.

Spilt Milk Costs Uncle Sam $77,399,685.00 Annually

It takes a herd of 667,997 cows each giving 5000 lbs. of milk yearly to supply the milk wasted annually in the U. S.

According to a schedule showing the division of dairy products, published by the United States Department of Agriculture, the annual cost of wasted milk in our nation would make a happy pay day for the army and navy and still leave an appropriation sufficient to build enough combat planes to satisfy even the militant Mitchell.

The amount of milk spilt, soured, rejected and otherwise wasted annually, is 3,339,986,000 pounds. This at $2.25 per hundred would approximate annually the stupendous amount of $77,399,685.

However, a cheerful note rings through this tale of economic loss to a nation. The same report shows a 1924 increase of 108 pounds of milk per cow over 1923 production. Deducting this from the figure previously given, leaves a loss through waste of only $13,607,325, a mere bagatelle, compared with our national debt of more than twenty billions of dollars.

The increased yield per cow is due to heightened efficiency on the farm; and future years promise even greater increases.

Dairymen have discovered the futility of feeding non-paying members of their milk herds. They have learned that losses lurk in insanitary milk production. They have discovered the advantages that lie in swatting the bacteria that hide in unclean stables, unclipped, unbrushed flanks and udders of milk cows and unsterilized utensils. As time goes on, the unavoidable waste of milk will be more than offset by intelligent feeding, complete sanitation and more efficient herd management.

NEW YORK USES HALF OF BUTTER MADE IN IOWA

Des Moines, April 22.—The city f New York receives approximately one-half of the creamery butter which is annually sold out of the state by Iowa creameries, according to data collected by the Iowa Department of Agriculture. This large volumn of butter which is sold on the New York market is two and one-half times as great as the amount of creamery butter consumed in Iowa.

Last year Iowa creameries manufactured 165,835,574 pounds of creamery butter. Iowa people consumed 28,518,348 pounds of this product, her other needs being met with farm butter. Approximately 67,000,000 pounds, or half of the butter sold out of the state, was shipped to New York. Chicago gets about one-fourth of the total sales, while Philadelphia and Boston comprise the principle markets for the remainder.

POULTRYMEN MAKE CHANGES

Days Of Brooder House Near House Are Fast Passing

"Times are changing in Iowa poultry raising. A few years ago one practically always found the brooder house with the baby chicks right up close to the dwelling. Now days if you step onto a farm where poultry is handled in an efficient way, you are likely to find the brooder house some little distance out from the rest of the buildings—possibly in a nearby oat field or small pasture."

These observations were recently made by F. W. Wesco, poultry extension specialist of Iowa State College, who has worked in many parts of Iowa. Mr. Wesco has found that poultry raisers are fast coming to realize that if they are to raise young chicks with any degree of success, they must get them out on clean grounds or yards.

Old poultry yards where chickens have run for several years are pretty likely to be infested with worms and diseases, the specialists have found Many cases of unthrifty flocks, poor egg production, and unsatisfactory growth have been traced to raising young chicks in old yards.

"Whenever you visit a farm in the fall where the young chicks have been raised on clean grounds, you usually find a strong, well-grown, vigorous bunch of young pullets and cockerels to use for breeding purposes or egg production," says Mr. Wesco. "This xplains why the wise poultryman raises his young chicks on clean, fresh grounds, an area where chickens have not run for several years."

CONVERT HOG "GYMNASIUMS"

They Will Be More Profitable If Turned Into Pastures

Too many so-called hog pastures in Iowa are really gymnasiums—merely places for the hogs to get exercise and not places to feed. It would be mightly profitable to turn these into pastures by plowing them up this spring and sowing them to rape, or a combination of oats, rape and sweet clover, or to sudan grass.

The above opinions were expressed recently by F. G. Churchill, farm crops extension specialist of Iowa State College. Mr. Churchill made an 85 mile auto drive a few days ago and he took special notice of hog pastures along the way. He observed that only three on that 85 mile trip looked as though they would really furnish a good lot of feed for the hogs.

If hog pastures were badly damaged by the hogs last year, it would be well to plow them up now, Churchill thinks. They may then be seeded with 6 or 8 pounds of rape, or they may be seeded with a bushel and a half of oats, 3 or 4 pounds of rape and about the same amount of sweet clover. Sweet clover, however, should not be sown unless the soil is well supplied with lime.

Where pastures were not badly damaged, they may be disced and seed sown in the spots where needed. Rape should be sown not later than May 15. After that date, sudan grass is the best crop to sow for hog pastures.

Ignorance of the law excuses no one, but knowledge of the law confuses every one.

ELEVATORS HERE INSTALL NEW AUTOMATIC GRAIN DUMPS

Both the Farmers Elevator and the North Iowa Grain Company have ordered new Globe automatic truck dumps to install in their respective elevators in Klemme. The dumps will be installed as soon as they arrive and should be in working order in a few weeks. The type of grain dump being installed will handle equally well trucks, wagons or sleds. The dumps are automatically controlled and operate with compressed air.

Klemme is fortunate in having such progressive grain dealers who are putting forth an effort to give the farmer the best of service and good market prices. Just another good reason why it pays to sell your stuff in Klemme—highest market prices and quickest service when ...t are busy.

ELECTRICITY FURNISHES FOOD "ON THE WING" TO WISCONSIN FISH

Fish are being fed by electricity now. Food is delivered "on the wing" to trout in the water.

The tale comes from Wisconsin, where Charles Wolf operates a private fish hatchery. He has strung electric wires over the pools and on these are suspended incandescent lamps which hang about three inches above the surface of the water. In the summer the lights attract ... swarms of moths and other ... flying insects which flit over and under the lamps

The trout have learned that the turning on of the lights means a great banquet in preparation; later on, the insects acquire a similar knowledge.

NEWS REVIEW OF CURRENT EVENTS

What Senator McKinley's Defeat in Illinois Republican Primaries Means.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

ILLINOIS Republicans administered a severe jolt to the World court last week, and the opponents of American adhesion to that tribunal are correspondingly elated. Senator William B. McKinley was a candidate for renomination in the primaries and the fight against him was based solely on the fact that he voted for American membership in the World court. He was defeated by Frank L. Smith of Dwight by about 125,000 votes. Washington was watching the contest with intense interest, and such men as Senators Borah of Idaho and Reed of Missouri professed to see in the result a portent that other senators who supported the World court proposition would be retired and that ultimately the act of American adhesion would be repealed. Though there was no statement forthcoming from the White House, the administration forces were plainly somewhat disconcerted and the World court senators who come up for re-election this year did not conceal their anxiety. Norbeck of North Dakota and Ernst of Kentucky already have been renominated, but the list also includes Bingham (Rep., Conn.), Broussard (Dem., La.), Butler (Rep., Mass.), Cameron (Rep., Ariz.), Caraway (Dem., Ark.), Cummins (Rep., Iowa), Curtiss (Rep., Kans.), Dale, (Rep., Vt.), Fletcher (Dem., Fla.), George (Dem., Ga.), Gooding (Rep., Idaho), Jones (Rep., Wash), Lenroot (Rep., Wis.), Means (Rep., Colo.), Oddie (Rep., Nev.), Overman (Dem., N. C.), Pepper (Rep., Pa.), Shortridge (Rep., Cal.), Smith (Dem., S. C.), Smoot (Rep., Utah), Stanfield (Rep., Ore.), Wadsworth (Rep., N. Y.), Watson (Rep., Ind.), Weller (Rep., Md.), Willis (Rep., Ohio).

"Illinois," said Senator Borah, "has indexed the sentiment in this country against the League court. The campaign against the court will go forward as promised immediately after the vote in the senate. We have no intention of ceasing efforts until the matter is settled in the forum from which there is no appeal—until it is settled and settled right."

George E. Brennan, Democratic committeeman, running on a wet platform, easily won the Democratic senatorial nomination in Illinois, which was highly pleasing to all wets. They also professed to see, in the fact that Chicago voted in favor of boxing exhibitions, an assurance that the people were beginning to revolt against all sumptuary laws.

There is a lot of vague talk to the effect that the defeat of Senator McKinley, one of the strongest supporters of President Coolidge, indicates loss of prestige and popularity by the Chief Executive. The political guessers said if Republicans of other states followed the lead of those in Illinois there would be no lack of men to contest with Mr. Coolidge the presidential nomination in 1928. Chief of these, it was believed, would be Senator Borah.

SMITH W. BROOKHART was unseated by the senate as senator from Iowa and his place was given to Daniel F. Steck, who was immediately sworn into office, the first Democrat to represent Iowa in the senate since the Civil war. The vote was close—45 to 41. Fifteen Republicans voted to seat Steck, and nine Democrats and one Farmer-Labor senator lined up with the Republicans who stood by Brookhart. As has been said in this column before, it is understood that Brookhart will enter the Republican primary in June as an opponent of Senator Cummins for the nomination.

AN AGREEMENT was reached in the senate to vote on the Italian war debt settlement on April 21, and the administration forces were confident that the house bill approving the settlement reached by the commissioners would be passed.

The senate passed a house bill to increase pensions of veterans of the Spanish war, Philippine insurrection and the Boxer rebellion and their widows and dependents in an aggregate of $18,500,000 annually. The measure went to conference for adjustment of differences between the house and senate provisions.

The senate judiciary committee, considering a resolution which seeks information regarding the prosecution of Senator Wheeler last summer, was balked by the refusal of Attorney General Sargent to answer Senator Walsh's questions. Mr. Sargent's refusal was based on the ground that the resolution was improper and that the information desired by Senator Walsh should not be disclosed because "publication would be incompatible with the public interest."

COMPROMISE has been reached in the controversy over the proposed Great Lakes-Atlantic canal. Both sides have agreed that the army engineers shall survey both the all-American route and the St. Lawrence route and report to congress next fall.

BEN W. HOOPER, W. L. McMenimen and Samuel Higgins were reappointed to the federal railroad labor board by the President. Their terms will probably be short, as it seems certain the Watson-Parker bill abolishing the board will be passed.

TWO measures contemplating development of naval and commercial aviation were passed by the house. One authorizes the $100,000,000 five-year naval aircraft program which would give the navy 1,614 new planes. The other creates the office of second assistant secretary of commerce for the regulation of commercial air transportation systems.

CHURCH, labor and peace organizations through their spokesmen attacked the Capper-Johnson bill for universal man power and complete government control of industry in time of war, before the senate military affairs committee. The measure has the backing of the secretary of war and the American Legion.

"WHAT we want is the strongest thing in enforcement and the weakest thing in liquor" was the statement of Mrs. Henry Peabody of Boston before the senate committee when the prohibition hearing was resumed last week, and it summarized the pleas of the 64 women who were with her as representatives of numerous organizations. Stepping forward in rapid succession, they presented their arguments succinctly and effectively, and if they were rather lacking in statistics, they made up for this by their fervor and by the realization that they were speaking for great bodies of women firmly united in opposition to any change in the Volstead act unless it were to make it more drastic.

Having yielded this day to the dry women, the wets took charge again, Father Kasaczun, a priest of the Pennsylvania anthracite region, and Mrs. Viola Andrews, chief of probation officers in New York, told of the evil effects of the Volstead law as observed by them in their respective territories; and the Moderation league of New York offered a huge mass of statistics and graphs. Then Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews, chief dry enforcer, was recalled to the stand and under questioning admitted that in his opinion the enforcement of the liquor laws would be easier if beer of a low alcoholic content were distributed under government supervision for home consumption. He said the sale of such beer in saloons should not be permitted as it might serve as a blind for bootlegging of hard liquor. Having brought out a lot of information as to the vast number of stills that are being operated, Senator Reed continued:

"Now, I want to ask you, as a man and a citizen, don't you think that the manufacture of liquor in the homes has a tendency to put the American home into direct and intimate contact with liquor?"

"Of course it does," replied Andrews.

"Is not this," questioned Reed, "bringing millions of families into contact with the manufacture and drinking of liquor; this secrecy, this contact with the police—is not all this utterly destructive of the morals of the home in which this goes on?"

"Unquestionably, it is seriously injurious," admitted the general.

All of which caused elation among the wets and led the dry leaders to say unpleasant things about Andrews, some even demanding his removal by the President.

With completion of the wets' case, the board of temperance, prohibition and public morals of the Methodist Episcopal church resumed the presentation of testimony in behalf of the drys' contention that the Volstead act not only should not be weakened but should be made more rigid than it is, if changed at all.

In the senate Bruce and Edge, wet leaders, prodded Borah until the Idahoan indulged in a dry outburst that brought the galleries to their feet with shouts of applause despite the efforts of Vice President Dawes to maintain order. Borah denounced the proposals of the wets to modify the Volstead act as schemes to evade the Constitution and therefore treasonable and tending to legal chaos, constitutional anarchy and the breakdown of constitutional government.

MUSSOLINI'S visit to Tripoli was watched with great interest. The premier was given a reception worthy of an emperor and his speeches there continued to suggest that the plan is to form a new Roman empire, though he is careful not to intimate that Italy seeks to acquire any more territory in Africa. Correspondents with his expedition seem to think no more land is needed as Libya's coastal plain is a valley 800 miles long and 200 miles wide, with more cultivable land than there is in all Italy. If properly developed it will furnish an outlet for Italy's surplus population. The land is very cheap now and does not need irrigation. Mussolini is the first chief of the Italian government to realize fully the possibilities of this region.

FRANCE and Spain called the Riffians to a peace conference at Oudja and handed them an ultimatum. If their terms are not accepted they are ready to launch a combined offensive that probably will wipe out the rebels. These terms include the abdication and virtual exile of Abd-el-Krim and the disarmament of the tribes. The allies offer to restock the herds of the tribesmen and to supply funds for the development of the country. Krim will be provided for suitably if he will give in.

FOR the second time Russia has unofficially declared it will not participate in the preliminary disarmament conference called for May 18 in Geneva, and it will not be asked again. Reports in London are that the conference may be postponed or abandoned, the French move to this effect now having the support of Poland, Rumania and some other states on the Russian border.

France and Germany have concluded negotiations abrogating most of the clauses of the Versailles treaty restricting German aviation development and have signed an accord permitting commercial flying without hindrance over both countries.

LATEST reports from China were that the Manchurian troops of Marshal Chang had broken the lines of the national army commanded by Feng and were about to attack Peking itself. It seemed likely they would soon be in possession of the city. Marshal Wu Pei-fu, who had been invited by the national army leaders to take supreme command at the capital, had made no move to accept, but was waiting with his army west of Peking, ready to take advantage of the situation, whatever it might be.

"Go forth this day with the smallest expectations, but with the largest patience, with a keen relish for and appreciation of everything beautiful, great and good, but with a temper so genial that the friction of the world shall not bear upon your sensibilities."

SEASONABLE FOODS.

If you enjoy tripe, you know that it is without waste, easily digested and reasonable in price. When selecting, take the tender pickled tripe, wash in cold water and cut into uniform slices. Dry in a cloth, then put in sifted cornmeal. Have ready a hot pan with two or three tablespoonfuls of hot fat. Lay in the tripe and cook until lightly browned on one side, then turn and brown on the other side. Serve with boiled buttered onions.

Apricot Sponge.—Soften a tablespoonful of gelatin in one-fourth of a cupful of water and dissolve in one cupful of apricot juice and pulp, heated hot. Add one-fourth of a cupful of sugar, stir until dissolved, then when the mixture begins to thicken, add two stiffly beaten egg whites. Serve in glass cups with sweetened whipped cream. Prunes may be used in place of apricots for variety.

Baked Ham.—Take a two-inch slice of ham from the center of the ham. Place in a baking pan and parboil with water to cover. Drain, spread with brown sugar and mustard, using a teaspoonful of mustard to two tablespoonfuls of brown sugar. Cover with the mixture, add the water from the pan and bake, basting often until the ham is tender.

Scalloped Potatoes With Meat.—Prepare a dish of scalloped potatoes, using plenty of butter and milk, cover with a layer of chopped meat, any leftover, and bake for an hour or more until the potatoes are thoroughly done. Serve from the baking dish.

Another way of using such leftover meat is to slice the potatoes, adding a fine sprinkling of onion; add a cupful of tomato and the meat, either ground or left in neat pieces. Have the tomatoes on top to keep the moisture in the meat. With seasonings and slow baking this is a very tasty dish. Serve sprinkled with a few cooked peas for a garnish. Serve from the baking dish. Such dishes are nice for a busy day, as they form the main dish.

Good Things.

The following cakes and cookies are good as long as they last. Doughnuts made with honey keep well and are moist much longer than those prepared with sugar.

Honey Doughnuts.—Take two eggs, one and one-half cupfuls of strained honey, one cupful of sour milk, three tablespoonfuls of melted butter, one teaspoonful of soda, two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar, and add a little salt. Roll as soft as possible and fry in deep fat.

Spice Cookies.—Cream one-third of a cupful of butter, add one-half cupful of sugar, and one cupful of molasses in which one teaspoonful of soda has been dissolved. Add three and one-half cupfuls of flour, cloves, cinnamon and nutmeg to taste, with one-half to a whole cupful of chopped raisins. Add a few chopped nuts if liked. When well mixed drop by spoonfuls on greased baking sheets. Sprinkle with sugar and bake.

Orange Cake.—Beat well the yolks of five eggs, add half of a cupful of water, two cupfuls of sugar, beating until well blended. Add two and one-half cupfuls of flour sifted with two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, add the juice and grated rind of one orange and fold in the well beaten whites of three eggs. Bake in layers, and ice with the following: To the two remaining whites, beaten stiff, add powdered sugar together with orange juice and the grated rind until the icing is of the right consistency to spread.

Chocolate Potato Cake.—Blend two-thirds of a cupful of shortening with two cupfuls of sugar; add two-thirds of a cupful of grated chocolate and one cupful of warm mashed potatoes, one cupful each of seeded raisins and chopped nuts, one-half cupful of milk and two and one-half cupfuls of flour sifted with two teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Add four eggs, whites and yolks beaten separately, one-half teaspoonful each of cloves and nutmeg and a teaspoonful of cinnamon. If baked in a loaf in a slow oven in a paper lined pan for one nour, it will keep a month.

Tongue and Eggs Tartare.—Cut the desired number of slices of cold boiled tongue into rounds, and on top of each place a half-inch slice of tomato. Cut hard cooked eggs crosswise and place a half with the yolk side down on each round. Top the egg with one tablespoonful of sauce tartare and garnish with watercress. When tomatoes are unavailable use tomato catsup spread over the tongue.

Chocolate Cookies.—Take one cupful of sugar, one-half cupful of shortening, one-half cupful of sour milk, one and one-half cupfuls of flour, one-half cupful of walnuts, one egg, one-half teaspoonful of soda and two squares of grated chocolate.

STYLES IN AFTERNOON FROCKS; FLARES AND FURS ADORN COATS

WHEN the discourse is of spring and summer styles in coats or suits, one may expect to exhaust the subject after a while and make an end of it. But when the talk is of spring's lovely frocks for summer afternoons, the conversation is simply "continued in our next" indefinitely and will not come to the end of the subject because there is no likelihood of its having an end. One pleasant episode follows another; for now that sheer fabrics and printed silks are established in the mode, designers find in them perpetual inspiration and incentive to vary the styles.

A Quaint Afternoon Frock.

The quaint and almost childish flavor of the youthful frock pictured here, is the result of several style features used to that end. One of them is the very full skirt, with flare insured by the plaited ruffle of taffeta and another is the rather high waistline with its plain silk girdle. The use of plaited taffeta on the sleeves is important and makes them unusual; the long ribbon ties fastened with a brooch, are even more unusual and the neck finish is demure and pretty. Worn with one-strap or plain slippers this frock will subtract years from its wearer.

When designers deal with printed silks, using them alone, or in combination with plain, sheer fabrics, it seems easy for them to turn out chic styles in afternoon dresses. In many of these the little scarf collar and tie cuffs are noted and they are made up in two-piece effects quite as often as in one-piece. There are many apron effects also by which the fashionable fulness is added to the skirt without disturbing the slim lines of the silhouette. These front flounces are plaited in side or box plaits, shirred or cut so that they fall in godets. All the sheer fabrics lend themselves to shirrings, tucks, and little ruffles and these —often aided by fine vestees and collars of lace and net—add to the daintiness and quaint style of charming summer dresses.

This spring's utility coats have a right to point with pride to increased dignity in style, as becomes the most important item in the season's street clothes. They are distinctly different from the regulation sports coats and there is nothing casual or easy-going about them, even when they are made of tweeds or other mannish cloths. Perhaps it is because they must live up to the almost universal touch of soft fur that they make a point of trimness and elegance; but more likely it is the return of the tailored mode to favor that has given them added importance.

Two outstanding style triumphs appear in the two utility coats as shown here. One of these is the coat of smooth-faced cloth that introduces the wide flare in the skirt, achieves a double breasted front, when fastened up, and remembers the becomingness of a side fastening. It proclaims its chic up-to-dateness by these means, but even more than all, in the finishing touch of fur about the collar. Fashion refuses to turn its back on fur but discards its winter furs and turns to summer furs with new interest. In this model the touch of fur is merely decorative and modish.

One would of course expect the plain tweed topcoat to come to the fore in a season of smart tailored styles and the tweed coat is as popular as ever. There are quite a number of novel weaves to give it added interest and it is often united to a smart cape by way of variety and greater warmth. The trim and efficient-looking coat at the right presents huge pockets and straps faultlessly tailored as sufficient and proper decorative features and adds a soft fur collar to prove that nothing else could make a better finish.

Two of the Latest Coats.

Hard to Overestimate Importance of Paint

It can hardly be overemphasized that exposed house surfaces of every description, whether they be floors or window sills, need constantly to be protected by a coat of paint or varnish.

Rough-surfaced walls absorb and retain moisture and gather dust. They thus offer ideal conditions for the retention and reproduction of dangerous bacteria. When we count germs by the million in a single drop of milk, and when we consider the great area of our walls, we see at once the need for a wall finish that is smooth, washable and waterproof.

While paint and varnish are beautifiers of great importance, they save more than the cost by preventing repairs and in safeguarding health. But they do even more. They reduce house-cleaning labor. Every woman knows how much easier it is to keep smoothly-painted surfaces clean than those where the grain of the wood is rough.

And, finally, paint gives a prosperous, up-and-coming appearance to things. Makes us proud of our possessions. We are prone to judge by appearances. When things are well kept and spick and span the effect on us is somewhat like that of a new suit of clothes. This "morale building value" of paint is of great importance. We "take on" our environment and our spirits and initiative are influenced by our surroundings. It was that thing "morale" that won the war. Paint builds morale because well painted property expresses happiness and thrift. The old proverb that "good paint costs nothing, for it saves more than it costs," still maintains its original truth in our own generation.

Model Citizen Makes Most of Opportunities

Whenever the citizens work in harmony, support movements for the common good, strive to be of as much service to their neighbors as to themselves, and live useful, helpful lives—then they are moving co-operatively toward higher and better things. There is a practical and a spiritual side. In a good town values are higher, homes more in demand. Every cottage cannot be a show place, but every man can keep his yard clean, take care of his premises and make the most of his opportunities. If they have the right spirit and the willingness to serve, their town will earn a good reputation fast enough, and after it is earned the rest of the world will not be long in hearing about it.—Exchange.

City Planning and Crime

Progress of city planning in America has been sufficient to demonstrate that there is a close relationship between physical conditions in cities and their moral and criminal records. This has been one of the arguments in favor of zoning ever since city planning work got under way actively some 18 or 20 years ago. Gradually there has been an expanding recognition of the moral influence of planning for the future of our cities. Slowly, but surely, the old argument that good zoning would help in the solution of the crime problem has been demonstrated. There no longer is any guess work about this. Such contentions favoring zoning are no longer merely theory. It is found that with the enforcement of zoning, which prevents expansion of congested areas and slums, these breeding places for crime become less harmful. — Cleveland Times.

Pointer for Builders

Homes, to be attractive enough for homeseekers to buy, must be better than those offered for rent, otherwise there is no inducement for the women folks to make a change. Builders in each locality have the best chance to study the needs of their own community, and a builder who can erect the right sort of a house is the man who will have plenty of business for the next few years.

Remember Lawn Needs Care

Do not fail to fertilize your lawn and garden. It may look as though the garden is going to do well and that your lawn will get enough grass food, but it is well to keep in mind that it takes some time for the fertilizer to become effective. Protect your lawn and garden by keeping it in perfect condition.

Color Schemes Changing

It is encouraging to see here and there throughout the country, new houses fearlessly decorated in unusual color schemes. It is no uncertain guess to say that these houses indicate what will happen to our domestic architecture within the next decade or two. People are becoming tired of the same old color schemes.

Build Arbors Now

Garden arbors can often be used to screen objectionable objects. These arbors can be made easily inside now and set out later. Vines, such as climbing roses, clematis, polygonum and wistaria, may be planted and trained over the arbor.

SUCCESS IN AMERICA AN OPEN HIGHWAY

How Four Boys of Humble Origin Have Become Chiefs of the Greatest Financial Organization in the World.

Broad highways of achievement are wide open to all in America no matter how humble their beginning, it is brought out by a writer in Forbes Magazine, telling of the successive elevation of poor boys to the chieftainship of the most powerful association of financial power in the world.

"Nowhere is opportunity so democratic as in caste-free America, nowhere is recognition for faithful service so little conditioned by inherited position and wealth," the article says. "The bounty of America in bestowing her rewards of great success upon those of modest origin is again notably manifest in the rise of Oscar Wells to the presidency of the American Bankers Association.

"The son of a tanner, John H. Puelicher, was elected to this eminence in 1922. Circumstances ended his public schooling in the seventh year and he went to work in a carpet store in Milwaukee. At sixteen he entered a bank as a clerk, rising step by step until he became president. Recognition of his abilities as a banker and civic service through public education in sound economic understanding brought him the highest reward from his profession.

"A former country school teacher, Walter W. Head, born in a farm hamlet in Western Illinois, was elected president of the association in 1923. He gave up teaching and a salary of $75 to enter banking at $40 a month in a small Missouri town. He subsequently became president of a bank in Omaha, the largest in Nebraska and a dozen neighboring states. The position he occupied in advancing agricultural welfare during the period of depression led to his being called the 'Granger President of the American Bankers Association.'

"From Irish immigrant lad to supreme head of banking in America epitomizes the career of William E. Knox, president of one of the largest savings banks of the country in New York. His business career began as an office boy in a publishing house, and he later entered the bank as a clerk. Experience with humble people in their problems of personal finance and his inculcation of economy in all matters attracted country-wide attention.

"Oscar Wells, who rises in 1925 as successor of these men, was born in an old weather-boarded log cabin house in the Missouri River bottoms of Platte County, Missouri. He became an orphan when three years of age, losing his parents in an epidemic that ravaged the countryside. He passed under the care of an uncle, head of a small country bank in Platte City, a town of a few hundred inhabitants, growing up on a farm and receiving his early education in a rural school. He later entered Bethany College, West Virginia, but at the end of his junior year he had to quit college and go to work in the bank."

His subsequent career was one of steady progress, first to higher positions among small country banks, then to larger city banks in Texas, where he rose to the top. In 1914 he was chosen first governor of the Dallas Federal Reserve Bank and served through the opening period of the establishment of that institution. He resigned to become president of a bank in Birmingham, Alabama, which has grown under his administration to be one of the largest and most successful institutions in the South.

HUGE GROWTH IN SCHOOL SAVINGS

New York.—School savings in the United States for the year 1924-1925 increased in aggregate bank balances by $5,500,000, with a growth of 630,000 in the total number of pupils participating, it is shown in reports made to the American Bankers Association, which declares that the returns encourage belief in the permanence of school savings as a part of the educational program in the public schools.

During the year the number of reporting school savings systems increased from 683 in 742 districts to 760 in 1,557 districts, the number of schools from 9,080 to 10,163, the number of pupils participating from 2,236,326 to 2,869,497, the deposits from $14,991,535.40 to $16,961,560.72 and the bank balances from $20,435,144.64 to $25,913,431.15, says W. E. Albig, in charge of the Association's savings activities.

Since 1920, the first year for which comprehensive statistics are available, the number of schools having school savings banking has increased 271.4 per cent, the enrollment in school savings districts 278.9 per cent, participants 520.2 per cent, deposits 506.1 per cent and bank balances 516.8 per cent.

Accounting for Proverb

One of the best-known proverbs is "A miss is as good as a mile." It is possible that the original proverb read: "Amis is as good as Amile." Amis and Amile were legendary soldiers of Charlemagne, and, besides being great friends, were considerably like one another in appearance. They were famous as the heroes of a widely known song. Later they entered into the traditions of the church and were invoked indifferently. Hence the proverb.

Spanish Treasure Revealed

After thirty years George W. Hawkins of Setauket, Long Island, N. Y., has revealed the fact that he has dug up a number of Spanish gold coins. Year by year he disposed of them to numismatists at a premium, there being 100 in all. He discovered the coins while digging holes for bean poles in 1894. Remnants of a canvas bag were found. The coins were dated 1770.

Proper Nails for Shingles

One of the most commonly neglected features in shingling roofs is the matter of nails. Good zinc-coated nails always should be used for wooden shingles. It is folly to attach a high-grade material, like the best wooden shingles, with cheap iron nails which will rust out in a short span of years and allow the shingles to work loose —Exchange.

Butterfly as a Delicacy

The Bugong moth or butterfly is a delicacy which epicures among certain aboriginal peoples of Australia will travel long distances to obtain. The butterflies foregather every year on the slopes of the Bugong mountains in New South Wales, where they are caught by being suffocated by the smoke of wood fires lighted under the trees.

The Oldest Wall

The great wall of China is the longest in the world, being well over a thousand miles in length. But it is not the oldest. The most ancient are the walls of Jericho. These were built 1,500 years before the birth of Christ, and are, therefore, over three thousand years old.

How Stormizing Pays For Itself

HOW MUCH DOES "STORMIZING" COST?

Stormizing differs from most motor repairs for it causes a direct saving in amount of fuel and oil required to operate the car. Stormized motors will show a saving of 15 to 50 percent in gasoline and oil over worn motors.

For the purpose of calculation we will say that Stormizing the motor of a $1,000.00 car costs $50.00 including all new pistons, rings and pins and that the worn motor averaged 14 miles to the gallon of gasoline. After this worn motor is Stormized the car will average 17 to 20 miles to the gallon.

1000 mi. at 14 mi. per gal. requires	71.4 gal.
1000 mi at 17 mi. per gal. requires	58.8 gal.
Saving in gasoline in 1000 miles	12.6 gal.
Saving in gasoline in 20,000 miles	252 gal.
252 Gallons Gasoline at 20c per gal.	$50.40
Saving in oil approximately	5.00
Saving in depreciation approximately	100.00

Stormizing not only pays for itself but it gives you a new motor to run. It's the logical way to get continuous service at low cost.

EXPOSES WILES OF FAKE STOCK SALESMEN AND PROMOTERS

Latest Methods of Confidence Men Described by American Bankers Association Official—Declares That Shrewder Schemes Than Ever Before Are Taking Peoples' Savings.

By W. R. MOREHOUSE,
Public Relations Commission, American Bankers Association.

ARTICLE NO. I

MUCH of the distress of many people in America today is due, not to the fact that they have not had an opportunity to earn and save money, but to the fact that they have lost their savings in fraudulent schemes of one kind or another. Many a widow is in financial difficulty not because she was left penniless by her husband but because she lost her inheritance by investing it in "gold bricks." Many a bank depositor who once carried a fine balance is penniless today not because he did not know how to save but because he did not know how to invest.

W. R. Morehouse

Perhaps if I relate some wild-cat promotions that give an insight into the activities of investment sharks it will quicken a relentless determination to provide depositors with much needed advice in investment matters. I have come in personal contact with many cases, some of them almost unbelievable because of the very crookedness of the schemes to defraud, yet thousands of our hard-working savers have been led to invest their savings in these promotions. In giving the high lights of certain cases I am not drawing on my imagination in the least, nor am I relying on hearsay, but giving first-hand information.

Unbelievable but True

Many millions of dollars have been lost in oil. The sum is staggering. Into ever corner of the United States the mails carry high-powered sales talk of great riches to be made in oil. Carried away by these promises, depositors quietly withdraw funds from their banks and send them on to wild-cat speculators. Not one out of a hundred has ever recovered the money he invested. Still wild-cat promotions continue to flourish, with a new crop of victims coming up to take the place of those who are forced out of the running because they have already lost their savings.

Listen to this one! It is a typical case. A tract of land, just ordinary land, nothing about it to indicate there is oil beneath the surface. An oil rig, a few tools, half a dozen strings of pipe are close at hand. A large show tent filled with chairs that will seat several hundred people. It is 10 a. m. The sun is shining brightly, and it is a glorious day.

Presently several large busses draw up loaded with people ranging in age from fifty years to eighty. A corps of high-pressure salesmen rush out to greet the arrivals and to assure them that they are most welcome to what will be the next great oil city of America. The aged and feeble minded are tenderly conducted to comfortable chairs under the big tent. In plain view of those seated as they peer out through the flap of the tent stands majestically the oil rig spattered with crude oil and nearby is the big oil sump also filled with oil. Through an ingenious circulating system oil from the sump flows into the well and back into the sump through a pipe in full view.

Religious Revival Methods

Presently the official lecturer calls the meeting to order. The impression he creates is that he is either a minister or has studied for the ministry. He opens the meeting with prayer for the success of the venture in oil. After prayer this sanctimonious gentleman tells how he has invested all of his own earnings and all of his children's savings in the venture, so confident is he that it is to be an oil gusher and all are to be made rich.

He charms his audience with his oratory. He impresses them with his honesty. He calls their attention to oil in plain view, intimating that it is from the well. And while he is painting before them, figuratively speaking, luxury and old age comforts if they invest in the "A-A" Oil Company, the foreman of the rig rushes in, his clothes spattered with crude oil. He is excited and almost out of breath as he reaches the sanctimonious lecturer. A few words are whispered. The lecturer's face registers great delight at the news. He turns back to his audience, a smile of victory on his face. The foreman rushes excitedly back to the derrick, wrench in hand.

"We have drilled to the 'Bell' sand!" the lecturer shouts, bringing cheers from every high-pressure salesman, followed by a chorus of voices from the surprised audience. "We can bring in a 5,000 barrel well if we care to, but if we go deeper to the 'Meyer' sand we can get a 12,000 barrel well!" he adds. "Go on deeper! Go on down!" shout the salesmen almost in unison, followed by cheers from the listeners.

From American Bankers Association Journal

The Fake Oil Stock Sale Was Opened With Prayer

The zero hour is at hand. The time has come for the high-pressure artists to sign up the listeners for units. The salesmen "hit while the iron is hot." Nearly every listener is signed up. The few who hesitate are forgotten only momentarily, for the tables are brought in and the big free lunch made ready. As all sit down at least one salesman is at every table. The work cut out for him is to sign up the few who escaped the first "pulling of the net," and you may take my word for it few escape.

One by one these old people, under the spell of being rushed into the deal, pay over their cash, sign notes or turn over good securities for units in the "A-A" Oil Company.

This picture of an oil speculation may seem too crooked to be true, but it is a real story of how thousands of savings depositors, all past the age of fifty, lost over half a million dollars This story is one of many hundreds that might be told, all of which have ended disastrously for millions of investors.

(Article II will reveal further fraudulent schemes for robbing workers of their savings.)

Truth and Advertising Have Made America Great

Truth in news columns and advertising is the foundation of America's prosperity, Melvin A. Traylor, Second Vice President American Bankers Association, recently said, adding:

"Continuance of our prosperity rests chiefly upon continuation of the greatest of all causes for our present good times—truth in news columns, truth over the store counters and truth in advertising. World-wide acceptance of great discoveries and inventions has been due to the fact that the newspapers truthfully described them and the manufacturers truthfully advertised them. If deceit had been the general rule, if the motto had been 'sell quick and let the buyer beware,' the public would have turned against the new things. I recall one particularly large firm which three years ago began advertising its wares falsely; it is today hopelessly bankrupt.

"Wise advertising costs nothing. You have only to increase the sale of your products to the point that covers the advertising charge to enjoy the enlarged business without cost. The natural saving in overhead is extra profit for dividends or for further expansion."

Thieves Loot Farms Near Reinbeck; 24 Porkers Taken

Five cases of thievery running into considerable money were reported to Grundy county officials from Reinbeck during the last week. The largest haul being made when Lee Wilcal, who has been ill, discovered that 24 hogs were stolen from his yards. The hogs weighed between 250 and 300 pounds. Forty head of Plymouth Rock chickens were stolen from the poultry house of the tenant family on the Ellett Lepley farm near Beaman.

Rich Soil Needed For Lawns

That those who plan on seeding a new lawn this spring had better get at it right away, is the advice of R. R. Rothacker, assistant professor of Landscape Architecture at Iowa State College. Rich soil is the biggest factor in the success of a lawn, Mr. Rothacker avers, for the lawn is often planted to last a lifetime. More lawn failures can be attributed to poor soil than anything else.

First the ground should be well spaded up and then rolled to show up the depressions which should be filled. The surface should then be scratched, the seed sown and a very light mulch of well rotted manure added to hold the moisture. The lawn then has everything it needs, provided mother Nature supplies a plenty of rain.

Most success in lawn seeding is gained by using rye as a nurse crop, cutting it back when it gets three or four inches high. Use a lawn [illegible] which is set high so the cut back too close. The [illegible] stool and shade the young plants. Experience has shown new lawn should never be cut close until the second year at least.

Ordinary standard grass seed, composed of Red Top, White Dutch Clover and either Kentucky or Canada Blue Grass, is the best for Iowa conditions. The clover grows quickly and the blue grass gradually fills in. The Red Top is a "jack of all trades" in the plant kingdom under almost any conditions.

Old lawns should be raked now and rolled if possible to reseat the plants which have heaved because of frost action.

If a lawn is watered at all it must be watered thoroughly and the practice kept up throughout the entire season whenever any slight drought threatenes, for spasmodic watering softens the plants, lowering the resistance to droughs.

IS CANDIDATE FOR SUPERVISOR

Mr. G. H. Lado, a re-tired [illegible], of Garner, this week places announcement in The Times for the office of county supervisor to succeed G. B. Lawhorn, whose term will expire soon. Mr. Lade says he has lived in the county for 39 years and has always been a heavy tax payer. He held the office of school treasurer in Concord township for about 20 years and was secretary of the old Concord Creamery. He has had a great deal of experience in drainage matters and feels he is well qualified for the offic. He states that if he is elected that he will devote his entire time to the office as he has no interests to interfere with the work.

Campers are often troubled with snakes which take refuge under bedding, boxes, or clothing. Although many common snakes are in reality entirely harmless to man and beneficial in their food habits, an unexpected encounter with a snake is an unpleasant experience. The Biological Survey of the United States Department of Agriculture advises campers to avoid pitching their tents in the vicinity of rocky ledges and swampy areas; clean, open camping sites are preferable. Bedding and clothing should be hung up during the day. Hunters in southern states have found that leather leggings afford sufficient protection against the bites of poisonous shakes, and quail hunters in Florida use a specially constructed boot with a shank including several layers of can[illegible]

"Ah!" he muttered. "Monsieur, I am shocked. My hundred thousand livres will never come back to me. Ah, well. We must say nothing to the old rat below. He shall think the land is still there; and he shall go with me."

"You will go on?"

"Pardieu! I must. And after all, there are many things not known about this country of the damned. Perhaps I, Francois Narbonne, may find riches after all! If not, I will be as well off as at the start. Ho, ho! Down hill there, old rat! Are you lost?"

"I hear you. But batten down your hatch, or we'll have a boarding party after our brandy. A canoe passed downstream a bit ago. Too dark to make out their rigging, but they spoke a foreign lingo, neither Spanish, French nor good old English. Wild Indians, I've logged it."

"One of my enemy's canoes, scouting the back-trail," I whispered to Narbonne. "His Choctaws must have discovered my smoke, and some of them are out to locate it. I must make the cut-off at Point Coupee as quickly as possible. It will take a day of hard paddling. If you are still minded to help mademoiselle forget her fears—"

"I would gladly paddle through hell to ease mademoiselle's mind, monsieur," he gravely interrupted.

I waited for Six Fingers to come up the bank, which he mounted with the agility of a monkey. He reeked of brandy and was in a beastly humor.

"Cheer up," I said, with malicious enjoyment. "There is gold ahead, a gold mine."

"Aye? That's why the devil bites me," he grunted. "There's two gold mines ahead, and I can't take both of them. This Narbonne's a crazy fool. If he'd told the yarn I'd laughed at it. But the second officer of the Maire believes it. He had talked with this Sagean, who visited the land."

"And the second gold mine?"

"Don't you wish you knew, my brave cock?" he mocked, his brandy giving him assurance. "Hark 'ee! A man who helped sack St. Augustine, and who has seen many a stout lad—some women, too—try to walk on the ocean with their eyes blindfolded, knows how to keep his hatch closed."

He swung on ahead of me, and I knew the brandy had stirred up thoughts of the old days; for in a low voice he was whining something about:

Low down, hull down,
We're off for Portobello-O
Women and drink, and the isthmus stink,
And our cap'n's very mellow-O.

He was as poisonous as a swamp-moccasin, but age had drawn his fangs; he was merely a shell filled with wicked memories and evil longings. If not for the danger of his babbling to Damoan I would have set him adrift with his brandy with as little compunction as I would shoot an alligator. When I came to the fire the girl and Narbonne were seated side by side before the dying bed of coals, the ruddy light playing on their faces and giving me the impression she was more at ease in his company than in mine. She asked:

"Are we to move on tonight"

"It is best. If we can travel till near daylight we can camp for the greater part of the day and reach Point Coupee at twilight. You can sleep in the pirogue while we travel tonight."

"I was not thinking of myself," she reproached. "I was thinking of you, monsieur, who must be so weary. And I know all this extra labor is because of me."

A man never takes amiss the pity and sympathy of a woman. He may deride it and he may know he is not deserving of it, but deep in his heart he worships the notion and feels like purring; for it is one form of a caress. I mumbled something intended to make light of it. She was foolish enough to imagine I resented her solicitude; whereas I was pleasurably confused and appeared to be gruff to cover up my diffidence. So I ushered Six Fingers down the bank and left the Frenchman to escort mademoiselle.

With the girl on the blankets behind me I led the way, after warning Narbonne and Six Fingers to keep close and indulge in no talking. Six Fingers was insistent on singing some of his evil old sea-songs and Narbonne was quick to curse him out for his indiscretion. I was patiently explaining the dangers of their carelessness when the girl emitted a shriek that could have been heard for a long distance. I dropped my paddle and stretched out a hand to arouse her from her bad dream, but as I touched her she seemed to be crawling overboard, and her voice was suddenly stilled. Thoroughly nonplused, I could not compel my mind to function until her stifled voice choked out:

"Save me, Englishman!"

Then I detected something in the water alongside the pirogue which had no business there, and my fingers encountered a brawny arm. As I clutched the naked flesh ten fingers seized my wrist, and the girl, released, screamed again. The pirogue careened as the thing in the water sought to drag me overboard. Clearing my ax, I relieved the strain by leaping over the side, yelling as I went:

"Sit still!"

As I struck the water the hand released my wrist and two hands grabbed my throat. Down we sank, and down swung my ax as we were going under. I felt the ax register, and the grip on my throat loosened. I kicked about and wrenched the ax free and satisfied myself the naked body was lax and limp, and then shot to the surface.

"Hush mademoiselle. It is all right," I softly told her before attempting to climb into the pirogue. "Hush your noise."

"Le bon Dieu!" she moaned. "Is it indeed thou, monsieur?"

"No other. All is well."

And I washed the ax and stuck it in my belt and climbed aboard and began anxiously peering about to see from what craft my assailant had swum.

"What is it?" I heard Narbonne cry.

"Stand by to repel boarders!" howled Six Fingers.

"Ah, the devil! How blind I am!" snapped Narbonne, and I heard his sword slithering against iron.

"In your throat! How does it taste?" cried Six Fingers.

"God help us! They fight between themselves!" faintly exclaimed the girl..

"They're attacked," I corrected, sweeping the pirogue about and heading downstream where I could make out the vague shapes of two canoes some distance apart.

With a wild war-whoop the canoe of the enemy began closing in on my two companions, their first assailants being Choctaws who thought to take them by surprise by swimming.

A flight of arrows hissed over my head and one or two stuck in the side of my pirogue. I snatched my pistols up from the bottom of the pirogue and emptied them, and then braced myself to use the musket as a club. Narbonne fired two pistols and Six Fingers let off a musket, and the pirogue frantically retreated toward mid-channel and downstream.

"Naked men in the water attacked us, monsieur," explained Narbonne as our pirogues drifted together. "I got one and the old rat dirked another. How is mademoiselle?"

"Dieu merci! I think I shall live, but I was dying of the fright," she whispered. 'Red hands at my throat! Can I ever forget when they would drag me into the river!"

"But they did not, mademoiselle," I sharply reminded her. "A danger passed is as though it never happened. Be calm. They have all gone. There is no more danger."

Narbonne asked what I purposed doing.

"Mademoiselle is nervous. We will land and wait until she recovers her composure," I said.

Her fingers closed on my arm, and she whispered:

'After all it was only Death that stalked me. Death is clean. It was its coming while I slept that unnerved me. Monsieur, you prefer to make a certain distance before daylight. Proceed. Do not consider me. I am myself now. It is nothing."

After reloading my musket and pistols and seeing that Six Fingers did the same, I again took the lead.

This time there was no need to caution my companions as to the value of silence. Nor did we again glimpse the Indians' pirogue although we kept to the river until well into the gray morning.

CHAPTER IX

The Fight at the Bayou.

We camped and rested, and the remainder of the journey to the big loop was finished late in the afternoon with nothing occurring to disturb mademoiselle.

The river talked to me. It taunted me with threats of ambuscades along the silent, brooding shore, it whispered of Damoan the Fox cunningly awaiting us at the big loop. The influence of the mighty waters rather worked on my nerves, and when an unusually large area of drift first appeared around the next bend I paddled to the bank and leaped ashore to reconnoiter it from a tree. I was suddenly taken with the notion that we had been seen and that Damoan's canoes were stealing upon us under cover of the onsweeping mass.

I hurriedly explained my purpose to Narbonne and the girl and had them come ashore and hide while I threw green boughs over the pirogues without bothering to extricate Six Fingers from the bottom of his canoe. Near the bank I found a tall tree and climbed it until I had an excellent view of the river beyond the solid mass of drifting trees. My fears were empty. There was no sign of Damoan's red hunters. Ashamed of my panic, yet greatly relieved, I descended.

Only a few feet from the tree I came upon the scene of a recent tragedy—a dead Indian. A feathered shaft stuck from between his naked shoulders and he had fallen while in the act of setting an arrow to bow-string.

The dead man was a Natchez. He was in the country of the Humas, who were of Choctaw blood and included in that confederacy. As I reconstructed the tragedy, he had been shot down from behind by a Huma and had run away and escaped discovery although ultimately dropping dead. I took the bow of acacia-wood and the quiver of reed arrows. The heads of the latter, fashioned from bone, were not barbed like the war-arrows, but were such as were used in hunting deer and buffalo.

The dead man had not been on the war-path. Carrying the bow and arrows, I returned to my companions, and, to spare the girl's feelings, explained I had found the weapons in the wood.

Clearing the pirogues of brush I set off with the girl with Narbonne following close. We worked hard, for only a short period of daylight remained for us. It was the beginning of dusk when we came to the tiny bayou. I drove my pirogue to the eastern side of the blockade and jumped out to investigate. By carrying the pirogues a hundred feet we could take the open water again. I aroused Six Fingers from his slumbers by the simple process of taking him by the shoulders and sousing him up and down in the river. He began a string of fearful curses, but by thrusting his monkey's head under water I soon took the heart out of him.

Tossing him ashore, I ordered him to help Narbonne with one end of the pirogue while I took the other. I was elated at having gained the cut-off without having to fight my way. I felt so safe with that hundred feet of drift hiding me from the river that I directed Narbonne slowly to paddle my pirogue and the girl along the bayou with Six Fingers bringing up the other while I tried my luck hunting. Pointing out a dead tree far ahead, I told Narbonne to halt there and build a small fire, taking care to shield it with blankets.

"We'll camp long enough to rest and eat and then push on," I told them. "It will save a full day's paddling and a possible encounter with Damoan and his Choctaws." Then taking the bow and arrows, and my ax, I scouted toward the main river in the hope of finding some waterfowl.

But move as silently as I would I could find no birds. When I was about opposite the dead tree I decided it was growing too dark for hunting and began making for the camp. As I turned my back a rustling in the underbrush behind me revived my hopes and I glided behind a clump of bushes and slipped an arrow from the quiver. The ground was clear of growth for a few rods, and as the sound was repeated I fully expected to see a rabbit enter the opening.

With the silence of a shadow a Choctaw warrior emerged from the growth and stood as if listening. Then he dropped on his knees and began examining the ground. I realized that he had found my tracks and would know at the first glance that a white man had been there. My next thought was the necessity of preventing the fellow from reporting his discovery. As he leaped erect I released the arrow. His yell of discovery was a second ahead of the reed shaft, and although he went down with the arrow sticking through his neck he had done what I intended to prevent.

That his companions were close at hand was proved by the almost immediate response to his wild cry; then there came the sound of men crashing recklessly through the growth. Next they were pouring from cover in single file until I counted an even dozen, and there were more behind among the bushes. The first warrior in the opening came to the dead warrior and dropped beside him and examined the arrow. Another was casting about for a trail.

"What do you find?" spoke up a soft voice from the bushes. It was Damoan the Fox speaking.

Before he could receive his answer I sounded the shrill war-cry of the Natchez and began discharging the arrows as fast as I could manipulate the bow. With cries of alarm and rage the Choctaws swept back into cover, for the moment believing the Natchez had taken the red path against the French and their allies the Gulf Indians. As I loosed the last arrow I turned and made toward the dead tree. Damoan's voice rose in a cry of triumph, and in Choctaw he shouted:

"The White Indian! It's the man we're after. These are hunting arrows. He plays tricks with the Natchez arrows. He is alone. After him!"

My sole advantage was the waning light which made it difficult to follow my trail. I ran on and soon struck the cut-off close to the dead tree. With a leap I was on the other side and kicking the fire into the water.

"What's wrong?" whispered mademoiselle.

"Into the pirogue! Quick! Narbonne! Six Fingers! Aboard and follow me quietly. We have a few minutes!"

They obeyed without a word, and with the girl lying flat to escape ball or arrow we worked rapidly along the sluggish narrow lane.

No sounds came from the woods to establish the position of our pursuers; and as the quiet continued the girl lifted her head and tremulously whispered:

"They have gone away, monsieur. We have escaped them."

I pitied her because of the rude awakening her hope was to receive. The profound silence told me the Choctaws were making every exertion to find me. At any moment I expected to be attacked from the bushes lining the bank. It was an actual relief to me, even though it made the girl moan in terror, when Damoan's high-pitched mellow hunting-call floated to our ears.

"It is nothing," I told her. "They have found our camp. They will not know whether we returned south, or came this way."

She did not discover any discrepancy in this statement, although it was so obvious a child should have realized that the discovery of us on the cut-off would point only to one course of flight—the course we were taking.

I knew they were following the cut-off, bounding along the bank like so many dark devils. I knew they had read the signs about our fire and knew how many were in the party, and that one was a woman. I picked up speed a bit and soon slid my pirogue up the inclined surface of a sunken log. I leaped to the bank and helped mademoiselle out, and whispered to Narbonne to give me a hand. He ran his canoe alongside and I stepped aboard, and the two of us were pulling my canoe off the log, when with a wild howl they were upon us.

Spaniard Gets Credit for the Frankfurter

What is a hot dog? Well, it is mostly bull; bull meat mixed with pork, highly spiced, steam cooked and smoked over hickory smoke. It originated in Bologna, Spain, so long ago that only the main facts may be recalled. They used to slaughter an enormous number of bulls in the arenas of Spain in days when bullfighting was more popular and more brutal than it is today.

It looked like a great economic crime to see so much prize beef wasted. But nobody wanted bull beef just so; bulls are tough and not so delicious as cows and steers are. A butcher in Bologna had an idea and bought bulls that were killed in the bull ring and made the meat into a sausage, mixed with pork and highly seasoned. Bologna sausage appealed to the popular taste.

Germans borrowed the formula, put the same sausage mixture into small casings and Bologna became "Frankfurter" in Frankfort and "Weenie" in Vienna. Coney island gave it the name of hot dog and popularized it.

One stand in Coney island that has been selling hot dogs for half a century is reputed to have a sale of five to ten tons of Frankfurters a day in the busy season. Somebody has to sell a lot of 'em to get rid of that 400,000,000 pounds a year.—Colliers' Magazine.

Sugar From Dahlias

A new dahlia and artichoke industry promises new life for domestic sugar manufacturers, according to Science. At present huge beet-sugar plants are lying idle two-thirds of the year for lack of raw material. It is now expected that after producing beet sugar in the summer the plants will run four months on artichoke, followed by four months on dahlia tubers to produce large quantities of the new levulose sugar. At present levulose is prepared only as a sirup or moist, powder-like brown sugar, but the problems of crystallization are rapidly being solved commercially.
